We use Adobe Connect for webinars, interactive trainings, etc.
We also created a handout for accessibility issues for presenters and participants.

I was wondering if anyone has ever conducted a "virtual conference"? If so, what were there experiences/lessons learned? Would they be willing to talk to me and my team? Any organizational vendor recommendations?

Any creative alternatives?

We are an Outreach team and we are trying to generate event-like interaction with travel budget constraints.

Would love to hear others thoughts/ideas etc.

Thanks in advance.

My agency has been holding small-scale virtual conferences every few months for several years now. We also use the Adobe Connect webinar service and have been quite happy with both it and the conferences. Adobe's service is scalable, so you pay only for what you need both in capacity and functionality. I'd be happy to share the lessons hard learned at your convenience.

Hey all,

We just started up our new podcast here and wondering how other agencies are hosting theirs. I assume there are a few that hosted internally, but anyone using external sites like soundcloud or the like? I am not sure what is available to federal agencies.

Question: Anyone know of some good, solid Drupal 8 Front-End Development training? I've honed in on Acquia and will probably just run with them, but just want to make sure I haven't missed anyone else before I hit the button.

These videos on YouTube seem well done and were created in partnership with Acquia for Drupal 8. They might be too basic for what you need but a member of my team found these useful.

Greetings Web Content Managers,

Last night we had a very productive meeting with a team behind Amazon Alexa, the Smart Assistant powered by AI (such as Apple's Siri, and Google Home).

We're actively exploring how federal public services can integrate into Smart Assistants like theirs, with different roadmaps and paths to implementation: from agencies developing these "skills" in-house to holding competitions and hackathons for proofs of concept.

Alexa's team and us would like to start with a baseline of the kind of ideas agencies have for which public services would be suited for smart assistants -- please put your thinking caps on and send us your ideas, whether a rough concept or a deeper take through identification of data sources to fuel the programs.

These concepts will help us as we begin framing what the process and considerations will be for enabling Smart Assistants, whether developed by us or by the private sector using publicly available data.

Also, if this emerging means of delivering public services is of interest to you, I invite you to join the Artificial Intelligence for Citizen Services Community. To join, email the AI Listserv.

You can also look at Drupaleasy. They do in person and online training and it's really good.

<https://www.drupaleasy.com/training/workshops> this has some of their workshops.

They are doing the NJ drupalcamp February 3rd. <https://www.drupalcampnj.org/program/trainings>

They have a number of D8 sessions (most camps are D8 now).

You can also look at Drupaleasy. They do in person and online training and it's really good.

<https://www.drupaleasy.com/training/workshops> this has some of their workshops.

They are doing the NJ drupalcamp February 3rd. <https://www.drupalcampnj.org/program/trainings>

They have a number of D8 sessions (most camps are D8 now).

Question: Anyone know of some good, solid Drupal 8 Front-End Development training? I've honed in on Acquia and will probably just run with them, but just want to make sure I haven't missed anyone else before I hit the button.

Thanks,

We are a State of Florida agency, looking for a volunteer management application. Can anyone recommend a volunteer management application they have worked with or created and are willing to share with us? We are even willing to test volunteer management applications you have heard good things about.

Any assistance will be most appreciated!

CiviCRM is a powerful open source tool. Lots of nonprofits use it, and the last time I managed such a site it integrated with Drupal reasonably well. (It has been a few years... I think it was a Drupal 6 site.)

Hi Michelle,

Re: Sticher - Why don't you ask Hope or someone in legal to take a look at the Sticher TOS. A few months ago Defense Acquisition U asked had their General Counsel review it and they were told it was okay to use. I found nothing objectionable either except for "Governing Law" in their Privacy Policy but GSA OGC has not reviewed. If you get the okay let me know and I'll try to get it added to the list of negotiated amendments.

Re: SoundCloud

We did try to amend the SoundCloud TOS on and off for about 4 years and NSF later took up the cause but in the end SoundCloud was not willing to negotiate.

Soooo

GSA/Digitalgov.gov decided to purchase Soundcloud thanks to recent changes to the FAR and GSA. FAR 12.216 neutralizes the Indemnification provision in the SoundCloud Terms and regulations added to the GSAR last year by Acquisition Letter MV-15-03 cover 15 other problematic subjects such as governing law, venue, disputes, and non-assignment.

While Federal agencies other than GSA are protected by the FAR clause that neutralizes Indemnification, those other agencies do NOT enjoy the protection of the GSAR (unless those other agencies have amended their own agency's specific acquisition regulations as GSA has done).

I hope this helps.

IF anyone else has information about either of these please let me know off list.

Thank you,
Betsy

Subject: Bulletproof Branding in Word: Recent experiences?

Today I find myself on that elusive quest for the perfect Word template: Using it, people will be able to create a document (a letter, a report, a memo—whatever that template is set up to support) in which the branding components are absolutely impossible to edit, and they still will be able to use all the features of Word to work on the body of the document. Furthermore, the finished document will be fully accessible —people navigating the document by keyboards or the equivalent will be able to reach all portions of the document, and assistive technologies will be able to transmit all the information as voice, Braille, or some other electronic format.

Of course, that can't be done. Even in the days of print shops and typewriters, a person determined to come up with their own "improved" design could find a way. Guidelines and policy are a huge part of making it work.

But do you have recent experience trying to crack the technological side of this problem? Any promising techniques since I last confronted it with Word 2007 and early Word 2010?

We are using various versions of MS Office: many people using 2010 and 2013; not so many using Office 365; and maybe even a few folks using 2016.

Thanks!

Hey all, I know this has been covered here ad nauseum, but I cannot remember how to search archives of this list. So I'll just ask – is there a TOS for google analytics for govies with a more realistic indemnification clause?

Thanks

Good morning,

Does anyone use (animated) .gif images in their web-based content? 508-UAAG states that GIF's can be use if blink frequency is not greater than 2 Hz and not lower than 55 Hz.

How would one measure this frequency?

Cheers!

Hello group!

My office is considering a content management system, but I am in sticker shock (annual cost for the program).

I would appreciate knowing what content management systems you use, if you love them, the cost (set-up and/or annual), and if you feel it is worth the value.

We currently use a tasking program not designed for content management and an in-house built content management system that is adequate for posting/hosting content, but not for the A-to-Z content lifecycle management process. We currently do this task manually via Excel or other formats. [Insert groan here.]

Hello, happy planning season! I'm looking for subject matter experts / evaluators of "web communication programs," to bounce ideas off of. This involves evaluation programs or systemic plans that are capable of generating for web staff, concrete and evidence-based advice to improve public sector web sites.

I have been collecting research questions and potentially actionable advice from the fields of 'social science' (social service program evaluation), web governance, web analytics, user experience design, customer experience maturity, etc. Some of which I got from members here (thanks!). I'm wondering, are you asking and answering questions like these? What is missing? Are you answering these types of questions in periodic reporting, and if so, what does that look like? What would be better than the below as guiding questions? I have been making attempts at reporting out on the first three phases below; still working. This is one way that different types of work could be sequenced:

Phase 1: Program audit. Where are we at? How should we describe the state that our web communication program is in?

1. What work is our group's web presence accomplishing for our group? This has three parts:
  - a. What are we trying to achieve with each specific content group that we are currently running on the site?
  - b. How will we determine whether we are succeeding? For example, we should think about the user experiences we create:
  - c. How can we build among staff a shared understanding of where we're at?
2. Are our publishing practices and coding consistent with the current best practices?
3. Is our web communication program operating efficiently?
4. Is our web communication program improving over time?
5. Do we have the infrastructure to be ready for the Next Big Thing? While we have successfully worked through Section 508 Compliance and OMB's Secure Connections Across Federal Websites standard, and we have implemented code updates to support responsive design, will we be ready for content syndication? The next mobile advances? Web content management system migration? Fill in the blank - there will always be a Next Big Thing.

Phase 2: Repair technical problems (Inventory, plan, implement, test/confirm, close out)

1. Resolve broken links. First, have a subject-matter expert review the content; if many links are broken in one group of content, perhaps it's a signal that this whole group of content has passed a tipping point, toward the "retirement" stage the information life cycle. Or, if not, fix the links.
2. Evaluate video and video players; optimize for browsers and devices.
3. Determine if PDFs, Word files, etc, can/should be converted to HTML.
4. Run search engine optimization checklists/reporting, perhaps based on results from an SEO spider report, perhaps a checklist run "manually" by a person.
5. Improve accessibility coding.
6. Clean up outdated tags such as valign in table cells. Avoid damaging displays (complete automation may cause damage, so, establish a work process; build an inventory, determine priority, create code to resolve, test, implement, test, deploy, etc.)
7. Etc. (running the plain language checklist, other checklists)

Phase 3: Elevate customer experiences. Create personas and journey maps. Conduct user testing. Make improvements.

1. What types of customers are we serving?

2. What do our customers want?
3. With what level of ease or difficulty are they completing the tasks they came to our site to do?
4. What do we know about the customers who CANNOT complete their tasks? Are our priorities aligned with their interests? Are we missing information that they need from us?
5. What drives their decisions? What do they care about? Why do they make the kinds of decisions that they do? Why are they moving from one place to another on the site?
6. What do they like?
7. What don't they like?
8. Which customer journeys in which site areas are problematic? What can be done to improve them?

Phase 4: Optimize our user experience toolkit and practice

1. Use on-demand analysis to model the relationship between customer experiences and business results
2. Build strong experience design practices using a structured training program
3. Score the extent that data helps the organization; address low scores systemically
4. Optimize the organization's outcomes for:
  - a. Release planning
  - b. Sustainable pace
  - c. Customer value
  - d. Design simplicity

Does anyone know of a government website with a black & white color scheme comparable in design to Smithsonian.com or newyorker.com?

It can be as plain as the Gov.uk site. I am just investing a lot of time in the quest to find it on my own (if one exists).

Good morning,

Does anyone use (animated) .gif images in their web-based content? 508-UAAG states that GIF's can be use if blink frequency is not greater than 2 Hz and not lower than 55 Hz.

How would one measure this frequency?

Cheers!

All,

I'm interested in this information as well. Our internal communications website is established, but we need a way to manage the content, which changes frequently. How do you do this when the website is already up and running? There's no budget for this, of course, but I don't know if anyone in government uses free software... Right now, we are using an Excel spreadsheet.

Thanks,

I'm in the process of migrating ntsb.gov to Drupal. Your cost could range widely between "X and Y" depending on the scope and scale of the project, resources required to build / migrate, and what sort of hosting set up you're looking at, but there are no out-of-the-box software costs. Pro is it's free and open source, though "free" like "free puppy" :) (possibly mitigated if you have / could get an in-house Drupal person and didn't need to worry about that going forward).

Overall, I'm very happy with moving to Drupal, and my costs have been less on the development side of things than on a very comprehensive requirements and content architecture / strategy process (so if you're happy with the website as it is and just need to move it, that would be less costly).

Hope this helps, please feel free to contact me offlist with any questions.

Hello group!

My office is considering a content management system, but I am in sticker shock (annual cost for the program).

I would appreciate knowing what content management systems you use, if you love them, the cost (set-up and/or annual), and if you feel it is worth the value.

We currently use a tasking program not designed for content management and an in-house built content management system that is adequate for posting/hosting content, but not for the A-to-Z content lifecycle management process. We currently do this task manually via Excel or other formats. [Insert groan here.]

Good morning,

Does anyone use (animated) .gif images in their web-based content? 508-UAAG states that GIF's can be use if blink frequency is not greater than 2 Hz and not lower than 55 Hz.

How would one measure this frequency?

Cheers!

Hi,

The NRO is going through a website revamp and we will be using SharePoint as a content management system. It is open source and FREE. I believe the CIA uses Drupal and I do have a comparison for the two someplace.

I am interested in this information as well. We currently use an old, paid version of DotNetNuke (6.2.5 Professional). For the most part it has been a reliable platform.

We are currently looking at other open source options that don't have a price tag attached to them, possibly WordPress or Drupal.

Thank you,

Um, SharePoint isn't free and it isn't open source. It's a Microsoft project that you may have access to at your agency, but you will need licenses for it.

Hi,

The NRO is going through a website revamp and we will be using SharePoint as a content management system. It is open source and FREE. I believe the CIA uses Drupal and I do have a comparison for the two someplace.

I am interested in this information as well. We currently use an old, paid version of DotNetNuke (6.2.5 Professional). For the most part it has been a reliable platform.

We are currently looking at other open source options that don't have a price tag attached to them, possibly WordPress or Drupal.

Thank you,

As a front end developer I agree with Mary about Umbraco. If you can use dotnet nuke, Umbraco will be a breeze for you. The community of Umbraco is very supportive too.

Hello group!

My office is considering a content management system, but I am in sticker shock (annual cost for the program).

I would appreciate knowing what content management systems you use, if you love them, the cost (set-up and/or annual), and if you feel it is worth the value.

We currently use a tasking program not designed for content management and an in-house built content management system that is adequate for posting/hosting content, but not for the A-to-Z content lifecycle management process. We currently do this task manually via Excel or other formats. [Insert groan here.]

If you're looking for something internal to use with a CAC/PIV-enabled audience, and would like to try out SharePoint, you might want to look into Intelink's Intelshare. It's free to users within the national security community, but doesn't offer any bells or whistles beyond "out of the box" features. Their documentation is available on their main site, which is also the place to request your own site collection. <https://intelshare.intelink.gov/>

All,

I'm interested in this information as well. Our internal communications website is established, but we need a way to manage the content, which changes frequently. How do you do this when the website is already up and running? There's no budget for this, of course, but I don't know if anyone in government uses free software... Right now, we are using an Excel spreadsheet.

Another vote for Drupal, Mostly because of the size of the community. Literally 10s of thousands of people are writing code for it. We moved to Drupal last year from a Coldfusion based CMS (Commonspot).

Apologies to those among us who have heard this story before. Also, please feel free to check our (recorded) live webcast on the subject, in case the grey paragraphs that follow aren't super-attractive before 10 am: <https://livestream.com/usinterior/events/3647477>

I'm quite happy with our current CMS solution. It isn't perfect, but it's wickedly cost-effective.

IBM provides our platform, a Drupal 7 (OpenPublic) solution on its FedRAMPed SoftLayer hosting. I won't go into specific pricing, but for <$11.5k/month, I'm currently running DOI.gov, BSEE.gov, BLM.gov, FCG.gov and DOIOIG.gov (our Inspector General's site). IBM handles all the security, platform updates, etc.

You may notice that our sites look different. That should be no surprise. Theming is, of course, independent of data. But you might not notice that our code-bases are also different. Roughly speaking, there's the LAMP stack (IBM's responsibility), the Drupal base (a modified OpenPublic that we refer to as either OpenDOI or IBM OpenGov -- also IBM's responsibility), and then the individual independent module collections (our responsibility). So, there's both common code and un-common code. For example, DOI.gov uses a module called panels. BLM.gov uses a module called panelizer. Is it easier to collaborate when we use more of the same modules? Yes. Do we micro-manage the bureau sites? No.

Where do we get our drupalists for ongoing development? The easy way is to use a set of 5 BPAs with competitively vetted vendors. We toss an SOW into the BPA pool and let the sharks compete for the work. Another way would be to use staff drupalists. Not so many of them exist. For design work, I would skip our BPAs and go with an IDIQ that my colleagues in the National Park Service hold.

The solution can also be spun to run like an intranet. We use PIV/SAML authentication with our Active Directory for Drupal authoring. It's not a big step to create a website where "read" permission on content is also authenticated by a PIV/SAML/AD process -- or just username/password. Whatever. It's up to you.

Here's the most important bit: We don't own the system. IBM runs the platform and can sell it to any federal agency. Our "purchase price" acted as seed money.

OK, I'm off. If there are questions, let's take them off-list. Thanks.

Good luck, Zona!

Larry

We currently use a tasking program not designed for content management and an in-house built content management system that is adequate for posting/hosting content, but not for the A-to-Z content lifecycle management process. Hi content managers!

This is my first time posting — I'm a content designer working at 18F. Right now I'm helping the Federal Election Commission with their 40,000 page website migration.

We're using Wagtail (<https://wagtail.io/>) as our CMS. It's free and open source. Even better, it's the most intuitive, forgiving CMS I've ever used in my career.

If you have questions and want to reach out to me off this list, please do!

Hi content managers!

This is my first time posting — I'm a content designer working at 18F. Right now I'm helping the Federal Election Commission with their 40,000 page website migration.

We're using Wagtail (<https://wagtail.io/>) as our CMS. It's free and open source. Even better, it's the most intuitive, forgiving CMS I've ever used in my career.

If you have questions and want to reach out to me off this list, please do!

A somewhat biased vote for Drupal here, as I've participated a bit in its development, but another important aspect of it is that literally thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of people dedicated to keeping sites secure are watching your back.

Whether it's core code or a contributed module, your own security initiatives will be augmented by the constant work of others who are identifying and plugging holes before miscreants can exploit them.

Another vote for Drupal, Mostly because of the size of the community. Literally 10s of thousands of people are writing code for it. We moved to Drupal last year from a Coldfusion based CMS (Commonspot).

Hi Angela,

I didn't know of any off of the top of my head, but recalled that a while back, a really talented designer on our team had built a neat tool that took a screenshot of the homepage of every .gov. I dug up the 1k of so images he'd made at the time and used the helpful cover flow view in Finder to skim through them all. I dragged out any that even remotely looked black and white and below is the list of 50 or so sites that I had. Two caveats -

- I was really liberal with choosing black and white themes.
- These images are 2 years old so some will have changed since then.

Hopefully though, you can click through them and see if any work for you. If you need help getting in touch with someone from any particular website holler off thread and I'm sure we can root out a POC.

Gray B.

Hi content managers!

This is my first time posting — I'm a content designer working at 18F. Right now I'm helping the Federal Election Commission with their 40,000 page website migration.

We're using Wagtail (<https://wagtail.io/>) as our CMS. It's free and open source. Even better, it's the most intuitive, forgiving CMS I've ever used in my career.

If you have questions and want to reach out to me off this list, please do!

Um, SharePoint isn't free and it isn't open source. It's a Microsoft project that you may have access to at your agency, but you will need licenses for it.

Hi,

The NRO is going through a website revamp and we will be using SharePoint as a content management system. It is open source and FREE. I believe the CIA uses Drupal and I do have a comparison for the two someplace.

3/12/2021

I am interested in this information as well. We currently use an old, paid version of DotNetNuke (6.2.5 Professional). For the most part it has been a reliable platform.

We are currently looking at other open source options that don't have a price tag attached to them, possibly WordPress or Drupal.

Thank you,

We relaunched our site in Drupal 7 in Sept 2014. For a relatively small agency we have a lot of materials - funding opportunity guidelines, podcasts, webinars, videos, a magazine, partner programs/initiatives - Drupal's been ideal for aggregating across sections of the site. We considered WordPress at the time but determined it wasn't robust enough for what we needed.

We are not programmers - the new site was built by a contractor, significant cost. Learning to use Drupal once the site was ready took time - the developers provided only limited training so we essentially trained ourselves - but it was a manageable learning curve. For early trouble-shooting and some very small development efforts we had assistance for several months from a Drupal expert at a sister agency.

In early 2015 we hired a Drupal development firm to assist with major site development, troubleshooting, and overall site improvement. This, of course, is an additional cost, but has been crucial to accomplishing agency goals. We are hosted on Acquia, a necessary expense for guaranteeing high quality performance and federally mandated security requirements.

And has been noted, the Drupal community (including Drupal.org) is a remarkable resource, and the platform accommodates practically open-ended custom development. Costs can be significant, depending on the scale and ambitions of the project; for us the investments up front and ongoing have been well worth it.

Dear federal employees,

We need your help! We are developing 3 short videos on vaccine-preventable diseases for vaccines.gov and healthfinder.gov and want to ensure they meet the needs of our audiences.

We would like to invite federal employees to help us “co-design” these videos by sharing your thoughts and opinions in a quick, online survey between now and Tuesday, Jan. 31. The purpose of the survey is to gauge knowledge and attitudes around select vaccine-preventable diseases. We anticipate the survey will take about 5 minutes. Results from this survey will directly inform the development of videos and responses to this survey will remain anonymous.

To start the survey, please visit: <https://www.surveymonkey.com/r/FDMMRWW>

Once we complete the videos in late 2017 we hope to share insights and best practices from our co-design and video development process. If you’re interested in learning more about what we find or have advice you would like to share, please email me directly.

We hope you’re able to participate and thank you, in advance, for your support.

Kind regards,
Jordan

I would also add for federal agencies and given the security focus we operate under, that any solution requiring custom coding will need a standing team with the capability to update and patch the system as needed. Drupal, for example, is PHP based. The PHP team is now releasing monthly updates that often include security updates. These updates need to be deployed and any PHP based application has to be tested (or you let your users test real time). Similarly, the Drupal team releases quarterly security patches which also may need to be applied, tested, and released.

Agreeing with Brad's comment about security, the risk and cost of writing code are much greater and are congruent with the amount of code.

Adding that fortunately, because of the size of the community there are few dead-ends with Drupal that would require custom coding regardless of the size or complexity of site you need to build.

Adding to David's comments, in terms of lifecycle costs, you need a career position to become expert from start to finish, through to all site operations and all contracted vendors year in / year out. In the community the experts needs what are often called the "site builder" skills to understand what developers have done and to interface with hosting staff.

Plain Drupal doesn't serve any specific purpose out of the box and if you decide to start with a pre-configured version (Drupal distribution) that is tuned for your situation, then your expert needs to know what parts are standard community software and which parts might use custom coding.

I would also add for federal agencies and given the security focus we operate under, that any solution requiring custom coding will need a standing team with the capability to update and patch the system as needed. Drupal, for example, is PHP based. The PHP team is now releasing monthly updates that often include security updates. These updates need to be deployed and any PHP based application has to be tested (or you let your users test real time). Similarly, the Drupal team releases quarterly security patches which also may need to be applied, tested, and released.

Subject: Re: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Content Management System question

We relaunched our site in Drupal 7 in Sept 2014. For a relatively small agency we have a lot of materials - funding opportunity guidelines, podcasts, webinars, videos, a magazine, partner programs/initiatives - Drupal's been ideal for aggregating across sections of the site. We considered WordPress at the time but determined it wasn't robust enough for what we needed.

We are not programmers - the new site was built by a contractor, significant cost. Learning to use

Drupal once the site was ready took time - the developers provided only limited training so we essentially trained ourselves - but it was a manageable learning curve. For early trouble-shooting and some very small development efforts we had assistance for several months from a Drupal expert at a sister agency.

In early 2015 we hired a Drupal development firm to assist with major site development, troubleshooting, and overall site improvement. This, of course, is an additional cost, but has been crucial to accomplishing agency goals. We are hosted on Acquia, a necessary expense for guaranteeing high quality performance and federally mandated security requirements.

And has been noted, the Drupal community (including Drupal.org) is a remarkable resource, and the platform accommodates practically open-ended custom development. Costs can be significant, depending on the scale and ambitions of the project; for us the investments up front and ongoing have been well worth it.

If it helps for context, DOI.gov has one full-time contract drupalist and has survived a year (not entirely happily) on a half-time drupalist.

It helps that we don't need to touch the base, just the custom code and our-site-only modules on top.

Agreeing with Brad's comment about security, the risk and cost of writing code are much greater and are congruent with the amount of code.

Adding that fortunately, because of the size of the community there are few dead-ends with Drupal that would require custom coding regardless of the size or complexity of site you need to build.

Adding to David's comments, in terms of lifecycle costs, you need a career position to become expert from start to finish, through to all site operations and all contracted vendors year in / year out. In the community the experts needs what are often called the "site builder" skills to understand what developers have done and to interface with hosting staff.

Plain Drupal doesn't serve any specific purpose out of the box and if you decide to start with a pre-configured version (Drupal distribution) that is tuned for your situation, then your expert needs to know what parts are standard community software and which parts might use custom coding.

I would also add for federal agencies and given the security focus we operate under, that any solution requiring custom coding will need a standing team with the capability to update and patch the system as needed. Drupal, for example, is PHP based. The PHP team is now releasing monthly updates that often include security updates. These updates need to be deployed and any PHP based application has to be tested (or you let your users test real time). Similarly, the Drupal team releases quarterly security patches which also may need to be applied, tested, and released.

Subject: Re: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Content Management System question

We relaunched our site in Drupal 7 in Sept 2014. For a relatively small agency we have a lot of materials - funding opportunity guidelines, podcasts, webinars, videos, a magazine, partner programs/initiatives - Drupal's been ideal for aggregating across sections of the site. We considered WordPress at the time but determined it wasn't robust enough for what we needed.

We are not programmers - the new site was built by a contractor, significant cost. Learning to use Drupal once the site was ready took time - the developers provided only limited training so we essentially trained ourselves - but it was a manageable learning curve. For early trouble-shooting and some very small development efforts we had assistance for several months from a Drupal expert at a sister agency.

In early 2015 we hired a Drupal development firm to assist with major site development, troubleshooting, and overall site improvement. This, of course, is an additional cost, but has been crucial to accomplishing agency goals. We are hosted on Acquia, a necessary expense for guaranteeing high quality performance and federally mandated security requirements.

And has been noted, the Drupal community (including Drupal.org) is a remarkable resource, and the platform accommodates practically open-ended custom development. Costs can be significant, depending on the scale and ambitions of the project; for us the investments up front and ongoing have been well worth it.

I'm a former contractor, now lead a team of 5 gowies that support our Drupal sites. I've worked with Commonspot, Sitecore, Drupal and WordPress. I can honestly say I've never ever seen a CMS deployment that didn't involve some sort of "custom coding" if by custom coding you mean the CMS doesn't do it out of the box. No CMS is going to 100% cover the use cases of a moderately complex website, and even if it did, the use cases will change over time and you'll need to adapt. When I've deployed Commonspot and Sitecore, 2 very robust proprietary CMS', there's always been some customization and extensions that required code, in the case of the Commonspot instance we replaced at NIST, there were thousands of lines of code.

The difference as I see it, over the course of my supporting Commonspot, I probably met 50-60% of the people supporting Commonspot. There just weren't that many installations and few people were developing or supporting it. The ability to write modular extensions was extremely limited and what finally came was clunky and not at all reliable. So every person customizing Commonspot was basically reinventing the wheel. (Not to pick on Commonspot, it's just what I know best) Now if you look at Drupal, there are something like 14000 people committing code to 20,000~ modules. These modules, known as "contrib" modules are supported by the Drupal Association's ~40 person security team as long as there's a final release i.e. 1.0. I would guess some of these proprietary CMS' don't have 40 developers building them.

Adding that fortunately, because of the size of the community there are few dead-ends with Drupal that would require custom coding regardless of the size or complexity of site you need to build.

Adding to David's comments, in terms of lifecycle costs, you need a career position to become expert from start to finish, through to all site operations and all contracted vendors year in / year out. In the community the experts needs what are often called the "site builder" skills to understand what developers have done and to interface with hosting staff.

Plain Drupal doesn't serve any specific purpose out of the box and if you decide to start with a pre-configured version (Drupal distribution) that is tuned for your situation, then your expert needs to know what parts are standard community software and which parts might use custom coding.

I would also add for federal agencies and given the security focus we operate under, that any solution requiring custom coding will need a standing team with the capability to update and patch the system as needed. Drupal, for example, is PHP based. The PHP team is now releasing monthly updates that often include security updates. These updates need to be deployed and any PHP based application has to be tested (or you let your users test real time). Similarly, the Drupal team releases quarterly security patches which also may need to be applied, tested, and released.

We relaunched our site in Drupal 7 in Sept 2014. For a relatively small agency we have a lot of materials - funding opportunity guidelines, podcasts, webinars, videos, a magazine, partner programs/initiatives - Drupal's been ideal for aggregating across sections of the site. We considered WordPress at the time but determined it wasn't robust enough for what we needed.

We are not programmers - the new site was built by a contractor, significant cost. Learning to use Drupal once the site was ready took time - the developers provided only limited training so we essentially trained ourselves - but it was a manageable learning curve. For early trouble-shooting and some very small development efforts we had assistance for several months from a Drupal expert at a sister agency.

In early 2015 we hired a Drupal development firm to assist with major site development, troubleshooting, and overall site improvement. This, of course, is an additional cost, but has been crucial to accomplishing agency goals. We are hosted on Acquia, a necessary expense for guaranteeing high quality performance and federally mandated security requirements.

And has been noted, the Drupal community (including Drupal.org) is a remarkable resource, and the platform accommodates practically open-ended custom development. Costs can be significant, depending on the scale and ambitions of the project; for us the investments up front and ongoing have been well worth it.

Fully agree with John. Do be careful when selecting a Drupal module.

1. Make sure it is well-coded. Well worth doing a code review because, some modules can be troublesome; especially if they are in early versions.
2. Make sure that the module meets security standards. Pay special to any dependencies that the module has. I was personally bit by a module that had an insecure dependency module.
3. Be careful about adopting a module. I've built applications with modules that the original developer gave up on. Suddenly, I've had to be the developer to keep the module going and updated. Modules are like kittens; they may be free but you may be spending time and resources taking care of them.

There was a great book by Greg Knaddison called "Cracking Drupal: A Drop in the Bucket." It was focused on Drupal security and had some great advice on picking modules. It's nearly eight years old and the Drupal community could benefit a revised edition.

All opinions are my own and do not represent the opinions of my agency.

I'm a former contractor, now lead a team of 5 govies that support our Drupal sites. I've worked with Commonsport, Sitecore, Drupal and WordPress. I can honestly say I've never ever seen a CMS deployment that didn't involve some sort of "custom coding" if by custom coding you mean the CMS doesn't do it out of the box. No CMS is going to 100% cover the use cases of a moderately complex website, and even if it did, the use cases will change over time and you'll need to adapt. When I've deployed Commonsport and Sitecore, 2 very robust proprietary CMS', there's always been some customization and extensions that required code, in the case of the Commonsport instance we replaced at NIST, there were thousands of lines of code.

The difference as I see it, over the course of my supporting Commonsport, I probably met 50-60% of the people supporting Commonsport. There just weren't that many installations and few people were developing or supporting it. The ability to write modular extensions was extremely limited and what finally came was clunky and not at all reliable. So every person customizing Commonsport was basically reinventing the wheel. (Not to pick on Commonsport, it's just what I know best) Now if you look at Drupal, there are something like 14000 people committing code to 20,000~ modules. These modules, known as "contrib" modules are supported by the Drupal Association's ~40 person security team as long as there's a final release i.e. 1.0. I agree with the very astute comments everyone has made about Drupal and CMSes.

It's easy to set up a website, but a robust CMS, that can support the myriad of security, privacy, digital strategy, section 508 compliance and user need that federal website must comply with, is not easy, nor is it cheap. It requires expertise. And expertise costs real money. The Open Source CMSes can be free or relatively cheap from licensing perspective, but a support contract for help, patches and maintenance can add to your expenses.

Agreeing with Brad's comment about security, the risk and cost of writing code are much greater and are congruent with the amount of code.

Adding that fortunately, because of the size of the community there are few dead-ends with Drupal that would require custom coding regardless of the size or complexity of site you need to build.

Adding to David's comments, in terms of lifecycle costs, you need a career position to become expert from start to finish, through to all site operations and all contracted vendors year in / year out. In the community the experts needs what are often called the "site builder" skills to understand what developers have done and to interface with hosting staff.

Plain Drupal doesn't serve any specific purpose out of the box and if you decide to start with a pre-configured version (Drupal distribution) that is tuned for your situation, then your expert needs to know what parts are standard community software and which parts might use custom coding.

I would also add for federal agencies and given the security focus we operate under, that any solution requiring custom coding will need a standing team with the capability to update and patch the system as needed. Drupal, for example, is PHP based. The PHP team is now releasing monthly updates that often include security updates. These updates need to be deployed and any PHP based application has to be tested (or you let your users test real time). Similarly, the Drupal team releases quarterly security patches which also may need to be applied, tested, and released.

Subject: Re: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Content Management System question

We relaunched our site in Drupal 7 in Sept 2014. For a relatively small agency we have a lot of materials - funding opportunity guidelines, podcasts, webinars, videos, a magazine, partner programs/initiatives - Drupal's been ideal for aggregating across sections of the site. We considered WordPress at the time but determined it wasn't robust enough for what we needed.

We are not programmers - the new site was built by a contractor, significant cost. Learning to use Drupal once the site was ready took time - the developers provided only limited training so we essentially trained ourselves - but it was a manageable learning curve. For early trouble-shooting and some very small development efforts we had assistance for several months from a Drupal expert at a sister agency.

In early 2015 we hired a Drupal development firm to assist with major site development, troubleshooting, and overall site improvement. This, of course, is an additional cost, but has been crucial to accomplishing agency goals. We are hosted on Acquia, a necessary expense for guaranteeing high quality performance and federally mandated security requirements.

And has been noted, the Drupal community (including Drupal.org) is a remarkable resource, and the platform accommodates practically open-ended custom development. Costs can be significant, depending on the scale and ambitions of the project; for us the investments up front and ongoing have been well worth it.

How many code repair problems do you think you will be hit with in 2017? Code / content changes that will require hands-on work,

- To meet an existing standard.
- To meet new standard.
- To take advantage of a new technology or new browser/device capability?

Where is the code you will need to change? How bad are the problems? In what order should you repair the problems?

So that's the design problem I started from... And the comments period is now open for a D3.js tool that helps you visualize and accelerate your web site repairs.

In addition to the visualization itself, this is a specific STRATEGY tool for processing site repairs, for people running large sites supported by many teams, where problem reports such as broken links, etc., are already being generated; this can be made to visualize reports that you get from other sources. It is a custom application that is enterprise-readable, interactive, and the visualization UI (D3.js) is free open source, with assembly required. The site I work with has around 30,000 pages, around 420 separate thematic groups of pages (microsites), and around 15 organizational owners. This is version 1.0, I am hoping. I'm using the Mottie table sorter as the accessible equivalent.

Feedback and thoughts welcome, on the theme of automating staff processes around web site repair. – Dan Wendling, National Library of Medicine

Hello all, seeking your advice.

On January 30 we went live with the new website - www.annapolis.gov. I've created (before we even went live) about 100 redirects - for the most requested pages. I also have submitted to Google (webmaster tools) our site for re-indexing. However, three days later, we still have very few pages with the new URLs (out of 50-60 thousand pages and documents) appearing in Google search result page. The old site URLs still prevail significantly in the search result page. Meaning when people google something pertaining to the City business, they end up with my custom "page not found" message. And, regardless of how user-friendly it is, pointing the visitors in the right direction, it's still not the same experience as getting to the right place.

A question: had any of you ever ran into a similar problem and how did you handle it?

Google has no contact info on this subject - to email or talk to a human, only messy forums with tons of irrelevant info.

Hello

Apologies to NIH'ers who saw this request already...but I am still looking.

NIDCR is building a new Drupal 8 website. We have some of the taxonomies and vocabularies done, but many others are not done.

For those of you using Drupal, are you willing to share your taxonomies and/or vocabularies to help us with building ours?

Thanks.

Hi Inna, is it possible for you to remove the custom 404 message and place with a 301 redirect on each page pointing to the new site, either the 1:1 page equivalent, or the closest relevant landing page for the topic? This will help the users, but it'll also help the spiders as they come through your site. the 301s will tell them that they need to replace their index records for those items.

Mary also directed you to some good suggestions, I'm a big fan of the Submit to Index button. But the 301s will expedite the old URLs getting cleaned out. Because 404s can get thrown in error, the spiders ignore them for what can seem like a very long time.

Best,
 Dawn

Hello group.

This may be outside of your scope but I will ask as it ties into social media plans and documenting such plans..

- 1) Would anyone be willing to share their male/female population via Twitter and Facebook analytics?
- 2) Re: Twitter, do you know how Twitter categorizes "companies" that are following your accounts? For example, how does Twitter know if followers (businesses) are male or female? I hope that made sense.

Also, I'm happy to share NROs social media plans once they are approved. Unfortunately at this time, we don't have metrics or staff capability to measure "behaviors" but we are using quantitative means to be more strategic in our planning activities.

Enjoy and thank you for considering sharing your data.

Hi all,

Thanks to many of you who shared your Twitter and Facebook data. It looks as if some of us are in similar boats regarding the disparity of followers between male/female populations. Here's some information that some of you may use.

WEBSITE: <http://womeninscienceday.org/>

Science and gender equality are both vital for the achievement of the internationally agreed development goals, including the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Over the past 15 years, the global community has made a lot of effort in inspiring and engaging women and girls in science. Unfortunately, women and girls continued to be excluded from participating fully in science. According to a study conducted in 14 countries, the probability for female students of graduating with a Bachelor's degree, Master's degree and Doctor's degree in science-related field are 18%, 8% and 2% respectively, while the percentages of male students are 37%, 18% and 6%.

In order to achieve full and equal access to and participation in science for women and girls, and further achieve gender equality and the empowerment of women and girls, the United Nations General Assembly adopted resolution A/RES/70/212 (draft A/70/474/Add.2) declaring 11 February as the International Day of Women and Girls in Science. <http://www.un.org/en/events/women-and-girls-in-science-day/>

Hi All,

40% of traffic on government websites comes from mobile devices (see living proof from the Digital Analytics Dashboard). While a number of government agencies have "mobile friendly" or "mobile first" presences, how "mobile friendly" or "mobile first" are these presences? Most importantly, how can they be improved?

The Federal CrowdSource Mobile Testing Program and Digital Analytics Program have helped me put together two webinars to help agencies explore these questions.

- During our Make Winning Mobile Moments-- Using and Interpreting Mobile-Friendly Tools webinar on Thursday, February 23rd at 2p.m. EST, David Fern, a QA testing expert from SSA and leader of the Federal CrowdSource Mobile Testing Program will talk about how agencies can test their mobile and responsive websites using online tools. David will go over tools from Google, W3C, help you interpret results and talk about ways you can address the errors these tests find. Sign up here!
- During the DAP Learning Series: Measuring Your Mobile Users webinar on Thursday March 16, experts from the Digital Analytics Program will show you how you can more effectively measure mobile and responsive web user habits. Sign up here!

Both events are completely virtual, no-cost, open to gov't employees, their contractors and other interested parties.

These are the first 2 webinars in a series of webinars to help make government experiences more friendly for a public that's on the go. We're planning more events focused on themes like human centered design/mobile and leveraging new mobile technologies (it's not just about apps and mobile web anymore!). If you have use cases in these areas or other ideas for programming, please let me know (jacob.parcell@gsa.gov).

Please sign up and share with people and networks that you think will be interested!

Thanks!

Jacob

Great stuff, Jake!

I'll add that each of us needs to look at our own stats instead of relying on the averages. You might surprised.

I certainly was: our English site is close to the average, where around 35% of our traffic is on mobile. But in Spanish, it flips, with about 65% on mobile!

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Two Webinars To Help Improve Your "Mobile Friendliness"

Hi All,

40% of traffic on government websites comes from mobile devices (see living proof from the Digital Analytics Dashboard). While a number of government agencies have "mobile friendly" or "mobile first" presences, how "mobile friendly" or "mobile first" are these presences? Most importantly, how can they be improved?

The Federal CrowdSource Mobile Testing Program and Digital Analytics Program have helped me put together two webinars to help agencies explore these questions.

- During our Make Winning Mobile Moments-- Using and Interpreting Mobile-Friendly Tools webinar on Thursday, February 23rd at 2p.m. EST, David Fern, a QA testing expert from SSA and leader of the Federal CrowdSource Mobile Testing Program will talk about how agencies can test their mobile and responsive websites using online tools. David will go over tools from Google, W3C, help you interpret results and talk about ways you can address the errors these tests find. Sign up here!
- During the DAP Learning Series: Measuring Your Mobile Users webinar on Thursday March 16, experts from the Digital Analytics Program will show you how you can more effectively measure mobile and responsive web user habits. Sign up here!

Both events are completely virtual, no-cost, open to gov't employees, their contractors and other interested parties.

These are the first 2 webinars in a series of webinars to help make government experiences more friendly for a public that's on the go. We're planning more events focused on themes like human centered design/mobile and leveraging new mobile technologies (it's not just about apps and mobile web anymore!). If you have use cases in these areas or other ideas for programming, please let me know (jacob.parcell@gsa.gov).

Please sign up and share with people and networks that you think will be interested!

Thanks!

Jacob

Hi all –

This morning, DHS issued implementation memoranda on the Border Security and Interior Enforcement Executive Orders. We also issued two fact sheets and two Q&A documents.

Moving forward, all DHS information related to the Executive Orders will be consolidated onto <https://www.dhs.gov/executive-orders-protecting-homeland> as a landing page.

Thanks!

I am searching for a tool for collecting opinions on our strategic goals.

The tool should be open ended, and use would be compliant with the Paperwork Reduction Act (i.e. not a "survey" of more than 9 people).

We could either code something up on our site (Percussion CMS on Apache with Cold Fusion), use our Survey Monkey instantiation, or we could use a third party tool.

Before I go Googling --- there are many options out there --- Has there been anything that has been a stellar tool for open-ended feedback for your agency/division/office? Allowing people to respond to each other, without succumbing to trolls, would be a plus.

In the past we used Idea Scale, but the policies around that are a bit cloudy to me right now...

Thanks,

Cheryl

Hi -

We're exploring the concept of an agency-wide BPA for digital messaging services (targeted email, text messaging, etc) for our field units and headquarters to leverage.

I'm curious if there are any other agencies out there that have established a BPA for these services and if you'd be willing to share your contract documents (SOW, PWS, etc)?

You can do so direct at my email address (dalbert@fs.fed.us)

I'd like to know if folks using Drupal in Gov are heading to Drupalcon. You can either email me directly or spam the list (I prefer not spamming the list).

I'm leaning toward hitting the Community Summit but I know Jess (EPA) and Becca (DOI) are planning the Gov Summit for Drupalcon.

<https://events.drupal.org/baltimore2017>

I'm also planning to head to Drupaldelphia on April 8, anyone else heading there?

<http://www.drupaldelphia.com/schedule>

Just really looking for a head count. I am trying to pull together a half day before Drupal con, so if anyone wants to host a Devops Half day at your agency geared especially for Drupal, let me know. I've got the speakers, just need a venue. It's not hands on so for once, we don't need Wifi.

Hi Donovan,

I'm actually in an acquisitions meeting right now, helping choose among three vendors. I can't let out any secrets, but if this goes well, you'll be able to get a decent result through FCG.gov without the need to roll your own BPA.

Or not. It's up to you.

What are you using now?

Perfect. Thanks Larry. I wonder how DOI's AAR process translates to USDA's AAR process (I forget even what AAR stands for now)? We'd rather not roll our own, unless we can negotiate lower pricing than what you all were able to get. I'll let our CO know what you're up to over there.

We're have a 1930's listserv in-place for a few of our national forests to use. We also have isolated implementations of GovDelivery, hence the desire to think about a BPA for the enterprise.

I went to Drupal Camp Florida to do a talk on User Experience and came away with the most amazing session about Accessibility I've ever seen.

The Speaker, Helena McCabe is an web accessibility expert who decided that she wanted to get an idea of how she could improve her code, so she put out a call and interviewed differently abled people. This includes people in wheelchairs, sight or hearing impairments, mobility impairments, and others and came away from the experience with a completely different mind set.

I thought I'd share her presentation here. She'll be at Drupalcon April 24-28th in Baltimore, but if you can't go, please, watch her session. She says she's obnoxious for a good cause, the cause of an accessible web.

Hello everyone:

What are some good tools, methods, or techniques for users to export visualizations from a website? For example, let's say a user creates a visualization from an online tool on a website. What are the best ways for the user to export the visualization as an image file? I'm looking for tools that other agencies have used successfully. Thank you.

I believe the top product for screen capture and screen recording is Techsmith's Snagit for images and Camtasia for screen video recording.

Camtasia has awesome, very easy to use, video editing capabilities. I love it, but it is only allowed on machines with Windows 8 – for us

Hi Folks,

I've been getting great responses to my last note, both on and off list. Thank you for those.

Here's the trick: I'm doing this review on behalf of FCG, a tenant organization of Interior, not for my office to distribute on its own. Since my office will be using the resulting "contracting vehicle," I have a vested interest in being sure the result doesn't stink up the place; but I'm not really the POC.

Here's a good contact at FCG:

Linda J. Wilkinson
Associate Director, Federal Consulting Group

(c) (b) (6)

linda\_wilkinson@ios.doi.gov

In fairness, I should mention that I'm not the only agency rep on the eval team; but I won't name-drop (what goes in contracting stays in contracting). If that person would like to confess to being on the team -- great!

Side-note: I should be putting out the Unofficial Digital Cabinet meeting/lunch invitation today. What would you say to shaking things up a bit? More later...

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Accessibility Video

I went to Drupal Camp Florida to do a talk on User Experience and came away with the most amazing session about Accessibility I've ever seen.

The Speaker, Helena McCabe is an web accessibility expert who decided that she wanted to get an idea of how she could improve her code, so she put out a call and interviewed differently abled people. This includes people in wheelchairs, sight or hearing impairments, mobility impairments, and others and came away from the experience with a completely different mind set.

I thought I'd share her presentation here. She'll be at Drupalcon April 24-28th in Baltimore, but if you can't go, please, watch her session. She says she's obnoxious for a good cause, the cause of an accessible web.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NeTNvTrrJ2o>

You can also see her presentation on auditing the Florida Drupal camp 2016 and 2017 sites.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Y-MJQ2U7Wlw>

She has lots of tool suggestions in there and you can watch her doing the audit, too.

It's an amazing presentation from some truly passionate about the subject. She's got so many amazing helpful points and ways to think about things I never could have gotten to on my own. Like how I can take spontaneous trips to the grocery for granted or that I don't need skip navigation for a bus from DC to NYC. Real world examples were incredibly helpful to me.

However, I wish they had taken the time to actually caption the video before posting and not rely on "automatic" "Google guesses what you're saying" captioning. In addition to being difficult to follow, the captions actually drop the F bomb at 52 seconds in.

It's a volunteer group that puts on these tech trainings, so I can't fault them on this one, but I suspect Helena would. The captioning is pretty good, until the questions were asked then, it's really bad.

But you can also reach out to Helena for a transcript, her email is Helena@lullabot.com

For all of our reference: while YouTube is terrible at creating transcripts from scratch, it's quite good at matching a prepared transcript to what it hears and assigning timing.

So if Helena has a transcript, she could easily fix the captions. Donna, let me know if you're going to contact Helena. If not, I'd be happy to.

However, I wish they had taken the time to actually caption the video before posting and not rely on "automatic" "Google guesses what you're saying" captioning. In addition to being difficult to follow, the captions actually drop the F bomb at 52 seconds in.

I went to Drupal Camp Florida to do a talk on User Experience and came away with the most amazing session about Accessibility I've ever seen.

The Speaker, Helena McCabe is an web accessibility expert who decided that she wanted to get an idea of how she could improve her code, so she put out a call and interviewed differently abled people. This includes people in wheelchairs, sight or hearing impairments, mobility impairments, and others and came away from the experience with a completely different mind set.

I thought I'd share her presentation here. She'll be at Drupalcon April 24-28th in Baltimore, but if you can't go, please, watch her session. She says she's obnoxious for a good cause, the cause of an accessible web.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NeTNvTrrJ2o>

You can also see her presentation on auditing the Florida Drupal camp 2016 and 2017 sites.
<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Y-MJQ2U7Wlw>

She has lots of tool suggestions in there and you can watch her doing the audit, too.

Actually, I'm OK without the captions. I just instinctively turn them on when available. I've become hyper-aware of the problems with YouTube auto-captions since my parent agency once posted an auto-captioned video that had the head of the agency talking about "shit information like this."

This was my first F bomb, however. :-)

Sorry to be late to the party if this question has already been asked and answered. I'm working on an acquisition, and there are a number of OMB memos I need to refer to in the acquisition. Should we leverage the duplicate Obama website to reference these memos and policies or is there something else we should use?

For example: <https://obamawhitehouse.archives.gov/sites/default/files/omb/memoranda/2017/m-17-06.pdf> links to the Policies for Federal Agencies and Websites.

Is this still viable? HELLLLLLP!

Thanks!

Yes, until the new WhiteHouse.gov website posts all of the historical memos and policies, please leverage the NARA archive. OMB memos and policies remain in effect, across Administrations per historical norm.

White House teams are working hard to re-post all OMB memos and policies on the new WhiteHouse.gov site ASAP, but no ETA yet.

Thanks for your continued patience and work.

Good question.

We're in the process of re-constructing OMB's piece of whitehouse.gov. Content should start re-appearing there soon.

In the meantime, you are correct that the archived Obama site is probably the best source, but note that it is static content so it won't reflect changes by the current Administration.

Here's a direct link to the static site: https://obamawhitehouse.archives.gov/omb/memoranda\_default/

Thanks,

SnagIt also has fantastic video recording capabilities. We use it all the time to record short videos to answer "How do I ...?" questions. It's often faster than typing out an explanation, and then we have a recording of the process to use when someone else has the same question.

I believe the top product for screen capture and screen recording is Techsmith's Snagit for images and Camtasia for screen video recording.

Camtasia has awesome, very easy to use, video editing capabilities. I love it, but it is only allowed on machines with Windows 8 – for us

Our office of communications is interested in getting metrics to better track the reach of internal email announcements. One of the tools they're interested in is Banana Tag, so we're about to do an evaluation for them of security and privacy concerns.

If any of your agencies are using it or have experience with it, would you let me know? It would be helpful to find out how it's being used within government already.

Thanks,
Emma

I concur with Cliff’s recommendation – I use SnagIt several times a day. I now have SnagIt 13, which is even better. Camtasia Studio 9 also has screen recording capabilities now and sends the video directly to a video editor to add more callouts and 508 compliance. Together, these two products are a very powerful combination for your desktop.

Hello all!

I have two question for the group.

(1) Are responsive design and Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions mutually exclusive? Our current beta site does not Ctrl - (minus) appropriately. I am being told this is because the beta is responsive in design. I don't buy that explanation. Am I wrong?

(2) Are Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions Section 508 compliance requirements or just best practices?

I would appreciate your thoughts.

Hi Jeffrey! Nice to hear from you, too.

What the heck is banana tag? I asked the same question when our Office of Communications asked me to evaluate it. Banana Tag is a tool for email marketing. It provides both metrics and a composer for nice looking emails in Outlook. It's similar to MailChimp, except you send your emails from your own desktop, instead of through the service. Since the need is for internal communications, we weren't looking for a hosted solution, but something we could use in our existing environment. OComm was also interested in the composer feature, as creating sophisticated looking email in Outlook can be a challenge. Here's the link: <https://www.bananatag.com/>

There may be other answers to meet their needs (including DIY with google analytics); that's why I'm looking into options for them. Any tool where the data is collected on an external server raises security and privacy concerns. I was curious if other agencies had resolved this or had found other solutions for tracking internal employee outreach and communications.

Thanks!
Emma

Hi Emma! It's been quite a while since I last saw you.

Could you educate us a bit about what Banana Tag is?

Thanks!

Our office of communications is interested in getting metrics to better track the reach of internal email announcements. One of the tools they're interested in is Banana Tag, so we're about to do an evaluation for them of security and privacy concerns.

If any of your agencies are using it or have experience with it, would you let me know? It would be helpful to find out how it's being used within government already.

Thanks,

Emma

We have a responsive design that also works with ctrl - / ctrl +.
We also have an on screen A+/A- option.

Someone else can reply as to the 508 specifics, but I believe BLOCKING the ctrl functions would be a 508 problem.

That's just weird. I have no idea why a dev would assert that removing control from a site-user would be a) a good thing or b) 508-friendly.

Please feel free to +/- on DOI.gov. If it fails, I'm going to be highly embarrassed.

Hi (b) (6) I'm in agreement with Larry here.

<https://blogs.state.gov/>

Ours is responsive. As is <https://www.state.gov/> and I just tested both, each responds to the new browser increases and decreases depending on the breaks.

Then I tried Nist <https://www.nist.gov/> and Commerce <https://www.commerce.gov/> yep, still works.

I think the person telling you this has no idea what they're talking about.

Add my voice to the chorus. <http://uscis.gov> is responsive and scales up and down just fine.

As to whether it's a 508 requirement, I don't know of anything saying that scaling the size of the site is a requirement. But why remove that capability?

Hi (b) (6), I'm in agreement with Larry here.

<https://blogs.state.gov/>

Ours is responsive. As is <https://www.state.gov/> and I just tested both, each responds to the new browser increases and decreases depending on the breaks.

Then I tried Nist <https://www.nist.gov/> and Commerce <https://www.commerce.gov/> yep, still works.

I think the person telling you this has no idea what they're talking about.

(1) Are responsive design and Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions mutually exclusive? Our current beta site does not Ctrl - (minus) appropriately. I am being told this is because the beta is responsive in design. I don't buy that explanation. Am I wrong?

(2) Are Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions Section 508 compliance requirements or just best practices?

It's as bad as those developers who deliberately disable a browser's back button function.

On the other hand, a simple search reveals most of the articles I could find on how to do this are dated 2013 and earlier. So it appears this bad practice has lost its flavor like over-chewed gum.

(To me, this situation is similar to close captioning.) Although font sizing is poignant in an accessibility discussion, I use Ctrl -/Ctrl + often. I bet other "regular" people do too.

Maybe the neighbor kid is lawnmowing his way to college - close captioning serves. Or, maybe the content is satire - large characters enhances.

If you are using Drupal Media: Youtube module you should be able to leverage the latest patch (comment #21) from this issue: <https://www.drupal.org/node/1405528>

This is just based on the discussion on the issue thread, I did not test this solution.

Alternatively if your Drupal implementation allows for an iframe inside a text area/body/WYSWIYG field, you could always use the YouTube playlist embed code directly in that field.

There is a patch but it seems to be iffy based on the responses and it didn't work for my site.

Once all of our phase 2 features are done, I was planning to revisit this and see if I can work on the patch. Oh, my rusty php skills.

If Tim's suggestion works better, I might have to add that to my Phase 2 list.

Hi.

We at DigitalGov have a few questions about the one service that unites people across all federal agencies — E-mail.

In many ways, e-mail is the lowest common denominator of communication services in the federal government and yet we know so little about how well it actually works for communicating across the govt.

I have talked to a few people who said that their agency strips out all links in e-mails, including the text that is hyperlinked. Some block all images and attachments. While a few have a 24-48hr delay for e-mails that don't come from their agency.

So, we are wondering — is there anyone who knows:

- what agency addresses are hard to send e-mails to?
- what agencies have tight restrictions, like blocking all links, images, HTML?
- what agencies have a delay, of any kind, on any e-mail that is sent?
- what are the best ways to get your e-mail white-listed within these agencies?
- are there agencies that block the tracking on e-mails by default (# of opens/clicks)
- who are the e-mail administrators/gate keepers for each agency?

What would we do with this information?

It would be nice to get a sense of how big a problem this really is and if it needs to be documented. Also, it would help us to craft our DigitalGov newsletter to be received by more people in the government.

Lastly, should there be a hyphen in e-mail? I still think so.

I'll jump in and posit one of the most difficult issues is providing authoring software or tools that are accessible and fully 508 compliant. That is via email and HTML survey. I recall several federal surveys crafted – no one named to protect the guilty – where we specifically had to go back to their rotating bag of vendor teams that were developing the surveys and get them to make the surveys compliant.

I've seen some commercial mailing list software that is pretty good at generating HTML5, including shims for fallback to something that works on all clients, however the staff has to take the time to add in alt text and other items.

So addressing that business need with recommended software for accessible HTML5 and responsive design email authoring would help.

Any external emails incoming to us get automatically updated with links that go to a proxy sanitizer, either ending in “You did a bad thing and your special points of contact have be alerted to your failure” to “are you really sure you want to follow this link” before allowing one to continue to the final URL.

Hope that adds some value.

Yours in service,

I'll join in and voice an opinion that there is a special part of hell designated for those who ignore convention of standard keyboard access and those that speak at the theater. If we received a formal complaint for Section 508, I'd be on the complainant's side.

Hi (b) (6), I'm in agreement with Larry here.

<https://blogs.state.gov/>

Ours is responsive. As is <https://www.state.gov/> and I just tested both, each responds to the new browser increases and decreases depending on the breaks.

Then I tried Nist <https://www.nist.gov/> and Commerce <https://www.commerce.gov/> yep, still works.

I think the person telling you this has no idea what they're talking about.

That's just weird. I have no idea why a dev would assert that removing control from a site-user would be a) a good thing or b) 508-friendly.

Please feel free to +/- on DOI.gov. If it fails, I'm going to be highly embarrassed.

I have two question for the group.

(1) Are responsive design and Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions mutually exclusive? Our current beta site does not Ctrl - (minus) appropriately. I am being told this is because the beta is responsive in design. I don't buy that explanation. Am I wrong?

(2) Are Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions Section 508 compliance requirements or just best practices?

I would appreciate your thoughts.

INFORMATION ARCHITECTURE: STILL VITAL TO DIGITAL DESIGN

Over the years, the most neglected, and yet most essential, area of digital design has been information architecture.

Recently, a set of presentations for website designs were made to senior management at a large organization. One presentation was based on data. It had carefully analyzed customer behavior and focused particularly on the navigation structure and wording. But it didn't have that polished graphical look. The second presentation was quite beautiful to look at but the creators used no customer data to create their design. They copied the old navigation, while focusing on eye-catching graphics. Unfortunately, senior management went for the eye-catching design. In 2017, it is indeed frustrating that many in senior management still want brochures instead of effective digital designs.

The number one reason for a poor digital customer experience are confusing menus and links. It was the number one reason back in 1995 when I started consulting on the Web, and it's still the number one reason for customer frustration and failure. This is based on data and observations of thousands of customers seeking to complete tasks. 8 out of 10 times when I tell management that it's the menus and links, they barely listen and hardly ever act to improve things.

Information architecture, navigation, metadata, linking; this is all hard, thankless, grinding work. And yet, this is how the Web is built, one link at a time. This is so much of the true value of digital lies. It's frustrating to know what needs to be done to improve the customer experience and yet not get the required management support and budget. Yet we must persevere because information architecture is such essential work.

What was the killer feature for Facebook photos? Tagging. The ability to add metadata tags in order to name who was in the picture. Since the beginning of the Web, metadata has been essential to findability. I have worked with numerous ecommerce clients, where choosing the right link text had a huge impact on sales. I mean HUGE.

And yet ... And yet so few organizations want to invest in doing quality, rigorously tested information architecture design. Always, there is the belief that some new technology will come along and solve the information architecture problem. Enterprise search has a history of incredible awfulness. Why? Because management invested in search engine after search engine but were not prepared to invest in the organization and management of their information.

And now we have chatbots and the "chat interface." Chatbots have tremendous potential but they are not some magical cure. They are not some plug-n-play technology that doesn't require us to have a navigation and classification.

How exactly are these chatbots going to chat? From what magic-magic land will they access their answers? Chatbots will require an extremely rigorous information architecture in order to 'chat' in a useful way. Otherwise, they'll pretty quickly become gibberishbots.

Making the interface 'invisible' requires even more effort in the design of the back-end information architecture. The more you simplify for the customer, the more internal complexity you must take on. Efficiently organizing information is—and will remain—one of the most critical skills of the digital age.

INFORMATION ARCHITECTURE: STILL VITAL TO DIGITAL DESIGN

Over the years, the most neglected, and yet most essential, area of digital design has been information architecture.

Recently, a set of presentations for website designs were made to senior management at a large organization. One presentation was based on data. It had carefully analyzed customer behavior and focused particularly on the navigation structure and wording. But it didn't have that polished graphical look. The second presentation was quite beautiful to look at but the creators used no customer data to create their design. They copied the old navigation, while focusing on eye-catching graphics. Unfortunately, senior management went for the eye-catching design. In 2017, it is indeed frustrating that many in senior management still want brochures instead of effective digital designs.

The number one reason for a poor digital customer experience are confusing menus and links. It was the number one reason back in 1995 when I started consulting on the Web, and it's still the number one reason for customer frustration and failure. This is based on data and observations of thousands of customers seeking to complete tasks. 8 out of 10 times when I tell management that it's the menus and links, they barely listen and hardly ever act to improve things.

Information architecture, navigation, metadata, linking; this is all hard, thankless, grinding work. And yet, this is how the Web is built, one link at a time. This is so much of the true value of digital lies. It's frustrating to know what needs to be done to improve the customer experience and yet not get the required management support and budget. Yet we must persevere because information architecture is such essential work.

What was the killer feature for Facebook photos? Tagging. The ability to add metadata tags in order to name who was in the picture. Since the beginning of the Web, metadata has been essential to findability. I have worked with numerous ecommerce clients, where choosing the right link text had a huge impact on sales. I mean HUGE.

And yet ... And yet so few organizations want to invest in doing quality, rigorously tested information architecture design. Always, there is the belief that some new technology will come along and solve the information architecture problem. Enterprise search has a history of incredible awfulness. Why? Because management invested in search engine after search engine but were not prepared to invest in the organization and management of their information.

And now we have chatbots and the "chat interface." Chatbots have tremendous potential but they are not some magical cure. They are not some plug-n-play technology that doesn't require us to have a navigation and classification.

How exactly are these chatbots going to chat? From what magic-magic land will they access their answers?

How exactly are these chatbots going to chat? From what magic-magic land will they access their answers? Chatbots will require an extremely rigorous information architecture in order to ‘chat’ in a useful way. Otherwise, they’ll pretty quickly become gibberishbots.

Making the interface ‘invisible’ requires even more effort in the design of the back-end information architecture. .mil folks should be careful answering these questions because their answers have second and third order effects that impact security (identifying agencies, etc., for example). And knowing .mil email practices will make them easier to spoof.

Suffice it to say, as you can tell by the added text in the subject, the Army's very strict. Think of a CYA way to blame the recipient of the email for doing anything wrong and that's pretty much it. :)

Email/e-mail are dialects but email is the proper version because that's what I use. :)

Thanks.

Hi.

We at DigitalGov have a few questions about the one service that unites people across all federal agencies — E-mail.

In many ways, e-mail is the lowest common denominator of communication services in the federal government and yet we know so little about how well it actually works for communicating across the govt.

I have talked to a few people who said that their agency strips out all links in e-mails, including the text that is hyperlinked. Some block all images and attachments. While a few have a 24-48hr delay for e-mails that don't come from their agency.

So, we are wondering — is there anyone who knows:

- what agency addresses are hard to send e-mails to?
- what agencies have tight restrictions, like blocking all links, images, HTML?
- what agencies have a delay, of any kind, on any e-mail that is sent?
- what are the best ways to get your e-mail white-listed within these agencies?
- are there agencies that block the tracking on e-mails by default (# of opens/clicks)
- who are the e-mail administrators/gate keepers for each agency?

What would we do with this information?

It would be nice to get a sense of how big a problem this really is and if it needs to be documented. Also, it would help us to craft our DigitalGov newsletter to be received by more people in the government.

Lastly, should there be a hyphen in e-mail? I still think so.

-jeremy

Good morning,

Our agency is exploring the possibility of switching our Commission Publication publishing process from Word -> PDF and Word -> HTML to something a little more flexible and XML-based. I know there are a lot of commercial products out there, as well as some XML schema that have been developed in-house at other agencies (GPO has been kind enough to touch base with us already).

For those of you using XML in your publishing process, would you mind sharing:

- Is what you use proprietary or did you develop it in-house? If you're able to elaborate on what you use and how it works for you, that would be great.
- The level of effort involved, both in terms of initial setup of the process and in terms of how long each piece of content/each publication typically takes to process.

Thank you very much in advance!

Quick Question to the Group:

I run a small shop supporting the website and other online properties for the Office of the Inspector General at HUD. I'm curious if anyone has an awesome vendor (large or small) supporting their Drupal development needs that they could recommend.

If they also work with the Acquia environment it would be a big plus.

Allison Hazen, I'm happy to see the interest in XML.

Unpopular as my viewpoint may be, I think XML is not replaceable. Like CSS, the idea is to switch semantics and context ... with the flick of a switch.

Same data set, new message.

But, honey-like organizational inertia is. Plus, do the young know that HTML is smarter than Word? And, XML may be even smarter?

To me, "freedom of speech" across the web begins with HTML, CSS, and PDF. Followed closely by XML and JSON. The rest is just frosting on the cake.

I thought gpo.gov might have something. Searched on "xml", but no luck.

Good luck,

Hi Allison,

My office, the Office of the Historian at the State Department, moved all of our publications to XML – specifically the Text Encoding Initiative Guidelines (<http://tei-c.org>). We use oXygen XML Editor (commercial, <http://oxygenxml.com>) for editing our documents, and eXist-db (free, open source, <http://exist-db.org>) to power our website (<https://history.state.gov>) and orchestrate conversions of XML to PDF and ebook. Under the hood, the transformations to PDF and ebook are done using TEI Publisher (free, open source, by the developers of eXist-db, <http://teipublisher.com>).

The level of effort involved depends on exactly what you're moving to XML and what your goals are for the product. We've done everything from paying vendors to scan books, extract the text, and apply our tagging guidelines – to in-house transformation of a book from manuscript chapters in Word to TEI, from which we generated the web and ebook edition and a print-ready PDF that went to GPO for printing. The benefits of single-source publishing are enormous. Besides flexibility and longevity, government agencies can release their publications as raw XML and foster use by the public – as open government data in service of transparency goals. We release all of our publications and source code to GitHub (<https://github.com/HistoryAtState>), so students, scholars, developers, etc. can build on our efforts.

Good morning,

Our agency is exploring the possibility of switching our Commission Publication publishing process from Word -> PDF and Word -> HTML to something a little more flexible and XML-based. I know there are a lot of commercial products out there, as well as some XML schema that have been developed in-house at other agencies (GPO has been kind enough to touch base with us already).

For those of you using XML in your publishing process, would you mind sharing:

- Is what you use proprietary or did you develop it in-house? If you're able to elaborate on what you use and how it works for you, that would be great.

Visited tei-c.org today, and found this in a paper.

"Outline

1. "What is it Going to Look Like?"
2. Data is the Important Long-term Outcome
3. Editors will only Switch Focus to Quality of Encoding if Publication Becomes as Straightforward as Using a Text Processor"

... <http://jtei.revues.org/1453>

=> straightforward as using a text processor

Do the content creators have any choice? It has to do with hypertext.

When I create content, I start with HTML and navigation, then plug-n-play the presentation later. If WYSIWYG is needed, I do CSS into an 8-1/2x11 box.

To me, that's the tough part. Otherwise, to me, the text, ASCII or UTF8, is enough. There's more to plain text than Notepad - I use Komodo Edit.

The first line of the abstract - "Are the data of an edition means to a particular and privileged presentation, or is the presentation a side effect?"

Hilarious. Like Haskell people say "Output is a side effect." (Note: The context is different, I think.)

I'm going to be thinking about this all weekend. Except when I'm reading "The Framers' Coup".

Happy Thursday,

Although the answers given address the spirit of your question, Zona, here's the direct answer:

- Making the presentation respond to the size of the viewport is responsive design.
- Locking the display to the size of the viewport is not. In fact, it defeats the whole purpose of responsive design, which is to give the user the best experience possible on the device of their choice.

Hope that helps.

And, yes, it sounds to me like all someone knows about responsive design is that it is what the code they cribbed is supposed to produce. ;-)

Hi (b) (6), I'm in agreement with Larry here.

<https://blogs.state.gov/>

Ours is responsive. As is <https://www.state.gov/> and I just tested both, each responds to the new browser increases and decreases depending on the breaks.

Then I tried Nist <https://www.nist.gov/> and Commerce <https://www.commerce.gov/> yep, still works.

I think the person telling you this has no idea what they're talking about.

That's just weird. I have no idea why a dev would assert that removing control from a site-user would be a) a good thing or b) 508-friendly.

Please feel free to +/- on DOI.gov. If it fails, I'm going to be highly embarrassed.

I have two question for the group.

(1) Are responsive design and Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions mutually exclusive? Our current beta site does not Ctrl - (minus) appropriately. I am being told this is because the beta is responsive in design. I don't buy that explanation. Am I wrong?

(2) Are Ctrl -/Ctrl + functions Section 508 compliance requirements or just best practices?

I would appreciate your thoughts.

Hi All, DigitalGov Search PM here. Closing the loop on these error inquiries - due to a configuration of our new logging mechanism, our service was knocked offline from 11:22-12:20 ET today. We've remediated the immediate issue, and are working with the logging team to make sure this never happens again.

I apologize for the impact this had on your sites and your customers. Please reach out with any questions, you can reach me directly, or contact the team at search@support.digitalgov.gov.

Thank you,
Dawn

William Brantley, thank you for sharing.

>> Love the concept of "Writing as the real UX." ... Your comment provoked my interest. I believe in writing.

Visited the link. First time, up through slide 6, I caught myself - "Design what? What is being designed?"

Restarted, proceeded to slide 11. Stop.

Restarted. Slowed down, and tried to read all the fine print. Controlled my impatience. Proceeded to slide 16. Stop.

Design what?

Thought about "The media is the message." ( That phrase never caught on with me. Maybe I'm too emotional. Nice rythm, but the message did not compute. I need more than than "media". )

I looked down "Design School? Yes" 17 out of 49.

I wonder.

I wonder about the intended audience of the presentation? Wanna-be designers with open-ended futures, or management analytics cloaked in well-defined ROI horizons.

An odd thing occurred as I fought with feeling I was a dummy, because I could not figure what the presentation was about. Was it about me or John Maeda?

I remembered an Atlantic article about how many of the NY ad agencies are now under European-based conglomerates. Here I'm thinking John Maeda is "talking" about injecting "design" into your marketing strategy, but not designers.

Where did John Maeda talk about writing? I didn't get it.

Thanks William Brantley. Guess this one was over my head.

Happy Monday,

The first rule in communication is make sure your message is clear.

I'm sure the Design in Tech report has valuable information, but when the actual usability of their document isn't, the message isn't clear. In this case, the current fashion of tiny light gray text on white background makes it impossible to read the report.

Good morning,

( Over here ... it's morning. )

1) About the document. My guess is the middling contrast between background and text colors is related to the "weight" of the verbal content on the screen. I'm thinking "weight" as in number of words per page. Due to the "weight" of each slide, high contrast may have been too loud.

Went home last night and watched the video.

<https://designintechreport.wordpress.com/2017/03/12/design-in-tech-report-2017-video/> - "Watch the Full 2017 Design in Tech Report on Vimeo (1hr)"

Was interesting. Open-ended. Not deep, intense, or floral. ( Shades of "The 24-Hour Wine Expert" !!! Jancis Robinson copy. 2016 ).

2) "Writing as the real UX" question

Maybe this is it? Slide 27 - More than Design

"Why UX Design is a Lot Like Writing" - Susan Stuart

3) GUI gedanken

I think the GUI owes it's success to writing by hand. And, writing by hand, as in a modern written language (sigh cursive), came from a need for pictures. Like stories. For storytelling. Is successful UX like an enjoyed story?

Anyone attempting visual notetaking? Sketchnoting?

-o-

Not sure about good design and business success. Thinking about art + marketplace + afterdeath.

Muchos mahalos William Brantley.

Happy Tuesday you all,

Hi, we are looking for a handful of volunteers to fill out our ranks. Thanks!

The National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences (NIEHS) is undertaking a study of the ease of use of the public website.

We are currently looking for a small number of volunteers to participate in a brief usability session to provide feedback on the site.

Sessions require a computer connected to the Internet, will last approximately 1 hour, and will be recorded, capturing your screen activity.

If interested in participating, please contact Cheryl Thompson (thompsonc2@niehs.nih.gov) for further details by April 10, 2017!

The sessions will take place in May 2017, and we will schedule around your calendar.

Thank you!

The next FREE Drupal4Gov half day is being hosted by the National Agricultural Library in Greenbelt, MD (really close, almost walking distance) from the Greenbelt Greenline metro stop (there's a shuttle and loads of parking)

This half day is all Devops including presentations on what's worked, what's failed, what's been tried and where they are now from Zivtech, Mindgrub and USDA where Ron Williams will talk about Drupal 8 at his part of USDA

<https://www.eventbrite.com/e/devops-drupal-half-day-tickets-32858557831>

So, come on out!! Let's get our Devops on! Seating is limited (70 folks is about all we can handle this time around), so sign up ASAP for the April 20th half day.

And, no computers needed this time out, just days before Drupalcon gets started in Baltimore!

Hello federal employees,

We need your help!

The USA.gov team at the GSA is looking to improve ways for users to find information in USA.gov. We are seeking volunteers to spend no more than 5 minutes giving us feedback on 3 simple questions about our website.

We are looking for people who meet the following criteria:

- Currently work as a federal employee (No contractors)
- Able to access a public URL online

If you meet the criteria, please email joanne.mcgovern@gsa.gov to receive further details.

Thanks in advance for your support.

Subject: Invitation: Participate in Inter-Agency AI Personal Assistant Pilot
From: Justin Herman - TAE <justin.herman@GSA.GOV>
Reply To: Justin Herman - TAE <justin.herman@GSA.GOV>

Greetings Web Content Community,

I'm pleased to extend this invitation for your programs to participate in a pilot program to index and benchmark public service information for consumer-available AI Personal Assistants (IPAs) including Amazon Alexa, Google Assistant, Microsoft Cortana, and Facebook Messenger's chatbot service -- and in the process lay a strong foundation for opening our programs to more accessible self-service in the home, mobile devices, automobiles and further.

This pilot will require rapid development and will result in your concepts reviewed by the platforms of your choosing, as well as the creation of a new field of shared resources and recommendations that any organization can use to deliver our program data into these emerging services.

You may have read about the pilot recently in Nextgov, though admittedly they mixed up the details a little -- this pilot is not for us to develop and host our own IPAs -- we've already received the support of Amazon Alexa, Google Assistant, Microsoft Cortana, and Facebook Messenger, etc, which will support cost savings due to working with pre-existing services and with wide reach because they will be native to services citizens already use.

Originally, we intended to work with 6 agencies for this initial pilot, but due to overwhelming interest we've streamlined the process, made it more agile, and are giving any program an opportunity to participate. The more who join, well, I'll just need to book a bigger room.

If interested, please send to me a confirmation email by Monday, April 3 with the following information:

1. #AIAssistantPilot in the subject line
2. Confirmation of availability to participate in the pilot
3. Declaration of problem or mission need potentially addressed through integration with IPAs (one or two sentences)
4. Confirmation that data/APIs exist that can be used to fuel a concept that could address that mission need

Note: participation in the pilot does not bind your agency to needing to complete it -- if along the way you determine it's not a right fit or won't make the impact you originally hoped, that experience itself will help us create new performance and analysis recommendations.

For those interested, below you will see a roadmap for how the pilot will operate. Approximate time to completion will be one month or less, but if something arises that makes the process longer then we are prepared to meet that. If we're going to do this, we're going to do it right and make sure that it counts. Most of the develop will take place internally, so there's no unnecessary requirements to attend phone calls or meetings unless your team wants it -- in which case, we're prepared to support and receive guidance directly from Microsoft, Google, Amazon and others. Whatever needs doing, we're prepared to do it.

Greetings Web Content Community,

I hope this email finds you well and productive.

As you know, we've been working with both agencies and private sector innovators to identify the business needs, requirements and resources needed to open public services up for new emerging citizen-facing technologies, from artificial intelligence and automation, to social technology and of course virtual and augmented reality.

While we were excited to open up the AI Personal Assistant Pilot (see below this email), that is just the beginning. Right now we invite you to potentially take advantage of an opportunity to open your public space data for one organization to create a virtual reality demo open to all of industry and the public as an example not only of the exciting capabilities available to all of us, but also to the potential of government data to fuel these innovations.

The challenge: identify a public space who can share their CAD data for Nvidia, whose GPUs are used across VR and AI teams globally, to create an open demo for anyone to explore that "takes users where they haven't been before." This could be a unique building, a landmark, a geographic anomaly, the International Space Station. But this is quick turnaround to get the data in their hands to develop as an experience for all.

If interested, please send to me a confirmation email by Friday, March 31 with the following information:

1. #VRDemo in the subject line
2. Confirmation of availability to participate
3. Description of space that will experienced through Virtual Reality
4. Confirmation that data exists that can be used to design the experience

I'm hoping to present 3 concepts next week for review, and of course you'll need to likely scrub for sensitive information and features. Ultimately, I'd like us to create a roadmap for any agency to use in opening up designs for innovators inside and outside government to use to fuel virtual and augmented reality programs, and this is one of our first steps.

Thanks everyone for all you do every day, and whether your interests are AI for Citizen Services or Virtual/Augmented Reality, there's a DigitalGov Community here to serve you. Here's to an unstoppable Spring.

Best regards,
Justin

So, I recently had a discussion with Helena McCabe about coming to DC (she'll be in Baltimore for Drupalcon) and doing brownbags about her research on accessibility and the work she does.

If you don't remember who she is, this is the info I posted back in February (if you do remember, just skip this part):

I went to Drupal Camp Florida to do a talk on User Experience and came away with the most amazing session about Accessibility I've ever seen.

The Speaker, Helena McCabe is an web accessibility expert who decided that she wanted to get an idea of how she could improve her code, so she put out a call and interviewed differently abled people. This includes people in wheelchairs, sight or hearing impairments, mobility impairments, and others and came away from the experience with a completely different mind set.

I thought I'd share her presentation here. She'll be at Drupalcon April 24-28th in Baltimore, but if you can't go, please, watch her session. She says she's obnoxious for a good cause, the cause of an accessible web.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NeTNvTrrJ2o>

You can also see her presentation on auditing the Florida Drupal camp 2016 and 2017 sites.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Y-MJQ2U7Wlw>

She has lots of tool suggestions in there and you can watch her doing the audit, too.

Since she lives in Florida, it's kind of hard to get her to town to talk accessibility for the web, so another option might be a webinar or multiple.

So, I wanted to find out if there's interest for either.

If you'd be up for hosting a brown bag at your agency (an internal, hey, let's bring her in as an expert to talk to our internal web teams) let me know.

If I don't hear too many interested in hosting brown bags I'm going to assume webinars are better and we'll reach out to Helena about pulling together a webinar through Drupal4Gov.

Hello,

Our Public Affairs office has literally hundreds of old photos dating as far back as the 1800s.

I'm wondering if anyone has any suggestions for photo scanning services.

Hi Bill,

I know you probably didn't mean to offend anyone, but there are a number of mothers, grandmothers, and women on this listserv working in tech. (My parents met in an engineering lab!) Please think about that before sharing links that reference stereotypes about a particular gender, age, race, ethnicity, or group.

Morning all, this article raises some good points about techies talking with non-techies about their work. Its amazing how little people who use technology all day long can know about how it works, and being able to communicate with them is an important skill, no matter their gender or role. But I do find the sub-title irritating - as a mom myself whose mom was writing code for punchcards, I can say, Yes! my mom is one of the only people who can explain what I do. Since the rest of the article is inclusive, mentioning parents at one point and both moms and dads at another, I wonder why the subtitle just mentions moms. Hm.

Best,
Dawn

Aside: The other day I was speaking to a co-worker who wanted to install something on his PC. In a prior professional life he was a personal finance advisor.

He: Can I install this?
Me: Do you have administrative rights on your PC?
He: Do you know how to buy a naked put?
Me: What?
He: Do you know how to buy a naked put?
Me: I have no idea what you're talking about
He: Then you stick to your business and I'll stick to mine.

I still don't know what a naked put is, even after reading the Wikipedia page, but I think he understands now what administrative rights are.

Good morning,

I do not understand why an apology [ William Brantley ] was posted.

For what it's worth, when I saw "Re:... My apologies" ala William Brantley in my email listing, I was confused, and intrigued. I paused, and wondered about it before I opened the email. No, I was not worried about being phish-ed..

After reading William Brantley's apology, I looked for the article - "3 Ways Technology Both Widens and Bridges the Generational Divide at Work". Was it "Could your mom explain what you really do at work?"?

Then, i skipped over the blog post. and paused at -

"Today, these titles are a dime a dozen for young professionals. In 2008, there were zero big data architects on LinkedIn. In 2013, there were 3,440. Given the sudden rise in titles like this, it may not come as a surprise that nearly 70 percent of parents admit they don't have a clear understanding of their children's jobs."

Perhaps neither of the above was the "hurt". But, I had to guess.

I do not understand why an apology was posted ... at all. My impression of the 3-point observance of the workplace was "ho-hum". For me, there was not the modicum of poignancy upon which a bruise or puncture might have occurred.

Personally, I think this article was not worthy of William Brantley's recommendation.

I'm a boomer, and around the late '80s, my dad made the remark "You should do something else instead of playing computer all the time.". Think DOS Lotus 123 v.2.4 on an HP Portable Plus.

My response, "Dad, I'm just writing, ... look." I was typing in my spreadsheet app. Ah so grasshopper. My dad looked at the display, saw the mock typewriting, and said "OK". What could he say, after all I had graduated from college.

So what's different?

The difference is that the old guy, my dad, and the young guy, me, were willing to talk enough until we reached a better understanding. At least we were face-to-face. Versus sit on our age and/or education difference, and fast judge.

To me, technology has not widened the generation gap, people did. To me, table legs do not kick big toes, people do. Technology is only a tool, look at the user.

Or maybe, I just got too much sun....

Happy Thursday,

I do not understand why an apology was posted ... at all. My impression of the 3-point observance of the workplace was "ho-hum". For me, there was not the modicum of poignancy upon which a bruise or puncture might have occurred.

Personally, I think this article was not worthy of William Brantley's recommendation.

I'm a boomer, and around the late '80s, my dad made the remark "You should do something else instead of playing computer all the time.". Think DOS Lotus 123 v.2.4 on an HP Portable Plus.

My response, "Dad, I'm just writing, ... look." I was typing in my spreadsheet app. Ah so grasshopper. My dad looked at the display, saw the mock typewriting, and said "OK". What could he say, after all I had graduated from college.

So what's different?

The difference is that the old guy, my dad, and the young guy, me, were willing to talk enough until we reached a better understanding. At least we were face-to-face. Versus sit on our age and/or education difference, and fast judge.

To me, technology has not widened the generation gap, people did. To me, table legs do not kick big toes, people do. Technology is only a tool, look at the user.

Hey Brian,

Yep - the article's subtitle, 'Could your mom explain what you really do at work?', may seem simple but quietly furthers a gender stereotype that's really problematic in our work scene.

There's been emails on two different listserves (content managers and open data) so for some folks, you might have missed some of the emails, but the guidance from our team's content style guide is helpful and links off to a longer piece on this that I'd really recommend. To some, especially those of us who have a lot of privilege in the tech scene, it can be easy to gloss over these things, but it's worth always trying to be a bit more aware and intentional.

Hello group and happy Friday!!!

I'm managing the refacing of the NRO.gov public website. Are there any web application developers out there with a background in agency IT infrastructure with knowledge about hosting environments, server types, etc. If so, it would be a huge help if I could pick some brains. Is anyone available? Or do you recommend a different group/POCs to pose some IT questions to?

Thanks very much.

Thanks to all who have weighed in & shared perspective.

Federal listserves should be a safe place for sharing ideas, stimulating discussions, thought-provoking questions/information, and exchanging our best practices & thoughts on how to improve serving the American people. Sure we all have our own preferences and I, for one, am glad that Bill shared this with us. No article is perfect. To me, that article was interesting. It generated discussion.

Mission accomplished. Thanks, Bill! Thanks, all!

(and sorry for spamming everyone -- valid point -- but thought it important to applaud the exchange of information & ideas)

Happy Friday!

My response, "Dad, I'm just writing, ... look." I was typing in my spreadsheet app. Ah so grasshopper. My dad looked at the display, saw the mock typewriting, and said "OK". What could he say, after all I had graduated from college.

So what's different?

The difference is that the old guy, my dad, and the young guy, me, were willing to talk enough until we reached a better understanding. At least we were face-to-face. Versus sit on our age and/or education difference, and fast judge.

To me, technology has not widened the generation gap, people did. To me, table legs do not kick big toes, people do. Technology is only a tool, look at the user.

Or maybe, I just got too much sun....

Happy Thursday,

Hi everybody,

I need your help. We're researching what customer satisfaction tools different agencies and teams use on the public .gov websites. Below are the customer satisfaction tools we've been able to identify so far:

- Foresee
- iPerceptions
- SurveyMonkey
- Qualtrics
- Uservoicye
- HHS' Voice of the Customer tool
- Google Surveys

Here's the question - do you know of any OTHER customer satisfaction tools, either that you use or that we should be aware of? If you can respond to me off thread, I'll really appreciate it!!

Gray B.

Hope everyone has an enriched weekend.

Whenever I think William Brantley, I think PhD. I like maths and books, but I'm not the PhD type.

With respect to the workplace generational topic, for those -
* with a comic approach to civilization and higher education, and * without regard to career earnings,

I suggest the following two -

1) TRANSCRIPT 2012 Hooding Remarks
George Will
June 4, 2012 — As Prepared
<http://www.princeton.edu/main/news/archive/S33/88/44Q33/>

2) TRANSCRIPT "Don't Eat Fortune's Cookie"
Michael Lewis
June 3, 2012 — As Prepared
<http://www.princeton.edu/main/news/archive/S33/87/54K53/>

Whenever William Brantley posts links, I check them out, because they vary in form and context, as well as tone. So far, none of his suggestions has been something I had already read. I have found some provocative, and some I simply worry about the graphic techniques. In any case, I appreciate the exposure and the potpourri.

Like beer and cookies.

That's why I liked the odd couple graduation speeches above. Because just prior ... I had heard of civilization cycle as in Spengler and Toynbee.

Und zo ... William Brantley, thank you for sharing.

Happy Friday.

I thought this was a good article with some great tips and examples. <http://www.govtech.com/analysis/Worst-of-the-Web.html>

One personal observation: in many conversations that I have had with developers and content managers, there is great emphasis placed on the relative merits of the tools. Such as Drupal versus WordPress; Ruby versus Python; CMS versus static site generators. These discussions are important to the folks who build and manage the sites. However, the end user doesn't care about the particular technology. The end user just wants a site that works. I bring this up because shifting to design thinking to construct a site will work much better if the initial focus is not on the technology being used.

All opinions are my own and does not reflect the opinions of my agency.

I agree. But it is easier/faster to learn about the technology than explore/attempt how your own website works. Not just your own pages, but across the whole kit and caboodle. More focused.

Interesting take from the author of the ITIF study. While I thought that study wasn't bad, it was quite possible for a site to score high in all of their categories while not meeting its goals (assuming some had been set) or without serving users well either. The ITIF study captured important things, but they didn't necessarily inform all aspects of user satisfaction.

So the solution is we all need to "partner" with IDEO? I think he meant to say they "paid" IDEO. If building good websites is just remembering three things, then why pay a high-priced design firm?

Anyway, the third point I love. Websites (or at least web content) should have expiration dates. Great idea.

Thanks for sharing

Agreed. I believe that the author was making the assumption that the design thinking will take care of meeting user satisfaction. However, that is not always a given.

If I may put in a shameless plug for the agency I used to work for, the Lab@OPM (Office of Personnel Management) offers affordable design thinking training and will facilitate sessions at a lower cost than IDEO. Or, agencies could download IDEO's free guide to design thinking and do it on their own.

Any good content management plan should have freshness dates built in and a regular content review process. Maybe people could share their best practices for keeping web content fresh.

All opinions are my own and do not reflect the opinions of my agency. (Thank you, John van Santen, for pointing out the grammatical error in my previous posting.)

Articles like this always remind me of an adage I heard long ago... "The problem with most websites is they are run by PAOs... when they should be run by librarians" and this illustration...

Forgive the job title. ☺

I thought this was a good article with some great tips and examples. <http://www.govtech.com/analysis/Worst-of-the-Web.html>

One personal observation: in many conversations that I have had with developers and content managers, there is great emphasis placed on the relative merits of the tools. Such as Drupal versus WordPress; Ruby versus Python; CMS versus static site generators. These discussions are important to the folks who build and manage the sites. However, the end user doesn't care about the particular technology. The end user just wants a site that works. I bring this up because shifting to design thinking to construct a site will work much better if the initial focus is not on the technology being used.

All opinions are my own and does not reflect the opinions of my agency.

So there's this (my emphasis):

For example, many cities struggle to build citizen-centric sites where information is organized around user needs rather than agency needs. The result is inconsistencies as users look up information on city parks, trash removal and transportation, since each of these functions is typically run by a different organization. The solution here is stronger accountability, so that government agencies have clear performance criteria for their websites and are held responsible if they do not meet these benchmarks.

Naw, bruh. Wrong solution.

A 21st century solution is to unlock this content from a "site." We continue to be shackled to this metaphor of a place to go. This is not helpful. We need to make a different investment for the future.

So the solution here is to make information available so it can be served in multiple formats--so that Google results can pick up your hours of operation and display them in a card, so that an aggregator can pick up related content and pull it together in an app, so that Alexa answers the question, so that it surfaces easily in a social search, so you can even post it on a website with it's dwindling visits, so you can feed your contact centers, and, most importantly, so you update it in one spot and it promulgates itself.

Practically speaking, there has been some terrific work from people in this community on structured content models as well as syndication beyond a site (I wish all gov content was available via API).

Time to break out of old, webpage-centric thinking. ::ducks::

So the solution is we all need to "partner" with IDEO? I think he meant to say they "paid" IDEO. If building good websites is just remembering three things, then why pay a high-priced design firm?

Anyway, the third point I love. Websites (or at least web content) should have expiration dates. Great idea.

The agency I work for is currently using an older version of SharePoint for document storage and we would like to upgrade to SP365; however, we are concerned about overall SharePoint accessibility and how best to manage agency employees from uploading inaccessible content.

We would like to hear about your experiences with SharePoint 365 accessibility, how you manage to ensure employees post accessible content, and any other feedback that we may need to take under consideration prior to upgrading to SP365.

Thanks.

Gwynne's comments are exactly why I love the movement toward API-First Content Management Systems.

Personally, I've been playing with Directus/Meteor/React. Love freeing the content to roam where it is most needed.

Anyone else playing with API-First Content Management Systems?

Bill ,

I'd be interested in knowing anyone in government who is doing that.

Drupal, WordPress and other CMS platforms let you create API's and I think that's the approach most government organizations are taking. The jury is out on how well those approaches work from an open data perspective.

CDC and some others have been doing it with their microsites approach. Here's a good case study on the Zika Virus mircosite.

HHS has been working on content models for government-wide use in Drupal. I think Christen Geiler posted about that a few days ago. She is actually presenting about that on a free webinar next Tuesday at 2 p.m. EST.

Also, I know the VR and Augmented Reality Communities are doing some work in this space.

I thought this was a good article with some great tips and examples. <http://www.govtech.com/analysis/Worst-of-the-Web.html>

One personal observation: in many conversations that I have had with developers and content managers, there is great emphasis placed on the relative merits of the tools. Such as Drupal versus WordPress; Ruby versus Python; CMS versus static site generators. These discussions are important to the folks who build and manage the sites. However, the end user doesn't care about the particular technology. The end user just wants a site that works. I bring this up because shifting to design thinking to construct a site will work much better if the initial focus is not on the technology being used.

We are in the process of re-building and redesigning DigitalGov to incorporate more structured data and make our information and resources highly searchable and consumable no matter what device you are reading it on — including a piece of paper.

And I am sure we'll be building out APIs where needed to aid in that distribution, but we are not building out an API driven site. We are building static pages (mostly).

In the coming weeks, we will send out a write up that explains more about how we are going about these changes, why we are doing it the way we are and how we plan on measuring the impact. Would love to get everyones feedback as we move through the process as opposed to sending out a note after the cake has been baked.

Yes, there is some good stuff around using the existing CMS platforms new API offerings. I like the Headless Drupal option and even gave a talk about my efforts to integrate Drupal 7, R, and Angular - <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BYE5qBm4c-c>
Fascinating experience albeit also a frustrating experience. Drupal 8 has a much better API implementation.

The rationale for my experiments with Directus/Meteor/React is that I want to start with a CMS that is built from the ground up with the API-First method in the design. I have also been experimenting with GraphQL (<http://graphql.org/>) and Apollo (<http://www.apollodata.com/>) in this mix. All part of my side project (or Plan B if I lose my govjob) on a next generation HR services platform.

As you see the movement toward VR and AI, I want to create a platform that can also incorporate those delivery vehicles in the near future. For example, I want a Node.js base so that I could accommodate Alexa skills (<https://jordankasper.com/building-an-amazon-alexa-skill-with-node-js/>) in the platform. I suppose that WordPress and Drupal could also have the same features but just how many modules and plugins can WP and Drupal handle before they break down completely?

On a side note: With all this experimentation, I am feeling the javascript libraries fatigue. ;-)

A content model is a representation of types of content and their inter-relationships. Content modeling takes content items and breaks them down into smaller structures, called content types. Open and structured content models can help you create content that is platform-agnostic, format-free and device independent. In the age of smartphones, tablets, social media tools, syndication and websites, the need for modular content is growing. The goal of implementing content models is to have the ability to create once and use everywhere.

HHS currently has 20 + models. The list of content models continues to grow as the site advances. In an effort to promote collaboration and help others utilize content models, HHS is sharing some of their content models via GitHub and will use this webinar to talk about them.

A content model is a representation of types of content and their inter-relationships. Content modeling takes content items and breaks them down into smaller structures, called content types. Open and structured content models can help you create content that is platform-agnostic, format-free and device independent. In the age of smartphones, tablets, social media tools, syndication and websites, the need for modular content is growing. The goal of implementing content models is to have the ability to create once and use everywhere.

HHS currently has 20 + models. The list of content models continues to grow as the site advances. In an effort to promote collaboration and help others utilize content models, HHS is sharing some of their content models via GitHub and will use this webinar to talk about them.

Thank you Christen Geiler and William Brantley.

This entry is simply a comment where I lift my voice at the end. This is not a request for assistance.

I wonder about "Information Architecture vs Content Models".

"Information Architecture vs Content Strategy—and Why YOU Need Both"
 "How to Create Portable Content with Structured Content Models"

I wish the posts had described the concept in terms of what they are not.

- * I used to think "information architecture" included hardware, traffic control, and physical storage. Now, I don't know.
- * I used to think "content models" included media layout, user clients, and sometimes, a physical object like a book. Now I think it's just some app.

Years ago (maybe ten), I ran into a classmate from high school. She was in graduate school at the University of Hawaii, in her first year of studying Library Sciences. She mentioned her professor and an application for use by researchers (I think) and XML.

To her, XML was "technical". I don't remember how I responded. I did not understand why XML is "technical" to Library Sciences. At the time, I had believed that XML and it's schemas were "content models". Kind of like the Dewey Decimal or Library of Congress systems. And I believed the management of the physical and digital resources, plus the responsibility for their security and safety, were "information architecture". I presumed both pertained to any brick-n-mortar library where people had jobs.

I just did a comparison of the initial snippets that show in a duckduckgo search of "information architecture" and "content models", and to me, they seem just as abstract.

I wonder. Can I relate "information architecture" to a four-drawer file cabinet, a physical, and "content models" to the filing system, a logical? Or is there no physicality to either of these terms? And where does the ocean of gray matter relate, ie. the user?

Or, are these two concepts impossible to explain to a user in terms of something not related to technology?

Forgive me. It's Monday.

Happy Monday and thanks,

Open Data & DigitalGov Teammates!

The White House is looking to highlight great work -- *YOUR* Federal agency work!

Now in 2017 is especially big because of the First 100 Days announcements with the new Administration on April 29th -- excellent opportunity to showcase your on-going successes and recent highlights in Open Data, Open Source, Open Science, Open Innovation, and DigitalGov. All submissions welcome!

For shout-outs, we invite each of you to share your agency's recent "wins" using the attached template (short, WH style with URL link). Materials needed by 8:00am, next Monday, April 24, 2017. No extensions.

Historically, OMB and OSTP have asked Federal agencies for Open Data, My Data, Open Innovation success stories (voluntary data call every ~6 months), so that we can help highlight & lift successes in data-driven government. It's that time again! This is a voluntary call for updates in recent months that are ready to share with the public.

Before submitting updates to the White House, please be sure to clear through your Federal agency comms/legal/front office for public release.

Feel free to contact me to discuss ideas or with questions.

Looking forward to your input!

Thanks as always,

We're preparing an RFP for a new contract to provide media monitoring and press release distribution services in the coming weeks. We currently are using Meltwater to monitor all varieties of media, provide some basic analytics, and for its ability to distribute press releases. That contract expires this year.

I'm putting together our market research and looking for input on solutions in use by other government agencies and what you pay for these services. I've received feedback internally from others in DOI but would like to broaden the estimate.

I'm primarily interested in the following:

- Company
- What services you use
- Number of user accounts versus number of users
- Yearly cost

Your help is very much appreciated.

Hello Web Content Managers,

We've launched the Github wiki for our inter-agency AI Personal Assistant Pilot that seeks that seeks to integrate our public service data into consumer available AI Personal Assistants like Amazon Alexa, Google Assistant, Microsoft Cortana and Facebook Messenger chatbot. Currently, agencies are sending me their Github user names to add to the system by COB tomorrow, then claiming or adding their individual agency pages (right now there's just placeholder information in each).

Once we turn the ignition key, we're looking to drive development quite quickly to get MVPs on the street, and give us the lessons and framework to create the more valuable roadmaps and resources so any agency can better evaluate and when appropriate follow suite. This will be a bit extra challenging, as many of the participants in the pilot have never worked open source before -- we do so out of necessity, for both efficiency and effectiveness. The effort is all about combining resources and skillsets in new ways -- customer service, content, open data, open source, social, AI, automation, the Internet of Things... like some Thanksgiving dinner spread of digital government.

If you would like to join the effort -- and agencies will need the insights and support from this community if this pilot is to succeed -- please reach out with your Github user name, I will add you, then you can declare yourself a participant in whichever the programs you see fit, whether its to support some one else, or commit to your own. For example, Recreation.gov just joined the program today after seeing the wiki -- don't let them have all the fun just because "recreation" is in their program name. There is no limit to the good contribution you can make in support of these programs who have dared step forward to deliver what's next -- please be generous with your expertise.

In the meantime, I'll keep updating the framework content, and we'll have this whole pilot wrapped up before you can say April showers bring May flowers.

All,
I've been asked to seek info from you all about captioning/transcription services that might be used by the other agencies. We currently use AutomaticSync. I have a list of the services sent to this listerv in 2016 (list copied below), but I'm wondering if anyone has services to add to this list or if you're using these services, would be willing to discuss their experience with them and their capabilities (I'd contact you directly outside the listserv).

Is anyone using or aware of a service that offers:

- an automated workflow (being able to submit jobs via a simple Web form),
- the ability to order a variety of caption formats at no extra charge,
- the ability to create additional formats after the fact at no extra charge,
- reliable short (3 days or less turnaround)
- re-syncing a fixed transcript to generate new captions for no extra charge, within a time period of initial submission?

Here's the list I have from previous emails to this group:

- YouTube timing/transcript tool and an intern to transcribe/caption videos
- Camtasia Studio 8 by Techsmith (Techsmith.com)
- Rev.com
- National Captioning Institute (ncicap.org/) for live captioning and castingwords.com for transcription
- AutoSync
- CC Movie Captioner (MovCaptioner) and Telestream CaptionMaker
- MAGpie, which is supported through Windows 7.0. MAGpie includes the ability to add audio-description – (ie - laughing, music playing)
- Synchron Voice and Video (synchronvideo.com) to create captioning file
- Caption Colorado (captioncolorado.com/)
- Relay Conference Captioning
- Recapd.com for live captioning

Here's the list I have from previous emails to this group:

- YouTube timing/transcript tool and an intern to transcribe/caption videos
- Camtasia Studio 8 by Techsmith (Techsmith.com)
- Rev.com
- National Captioning Institute (ncicap.org/) for live captioning and castingwords.com for transcription
- AutoSync
- CC Movie Captioner (MovCaptioner) and Telestream CaptionMaker
- MAGpie, which is supported through Windows 7.0. MAGpie includes the ability to add audio-description – (ie - laughing, music playing)
- Synchron Voice and Video (synchronvideo.com) to create captioning file
- Caption Colorado (captioncolorado.com/)
- Relay Conference Captioning
- Recapd.com for live captioning

Check with automaticsync.com. They have GSA pricing (you have to call and request it). They are fast, accurate and responsive. I don't know about everything on your list, but I can speak to ease of submission (totally online) fast turn-around option (CRAZY affordable) and super easy to work with if there's a problem.

All,

I've been asked to seek info from you all about captioning/transcription services that might be used by the other agencies. We currently use AutomaticSync. I have a list of the services sent to this listerv in 2016 (list copied below), but I'm wondering if anyone has services to add to this list or if you're using these services, would be willing to discuss their experience with them and their capabilities (I'd contact you directly outside the listserv).

Is anyone using or aware of a service that offers:

- the ability to order a variety of caption formats at no extra charge,
- the ability to create additional formats after the fact at no extra charge,

Hello everyone,

This question is focused on internal communication tools for promoting intranet content.

Has anyone in this group set up an Active Directory distribution group that self-manages, meaning...it allows people to opt-in or opt-out? If so, how did this go? We are trying to mitigate the labor involved in managing the group membership and also let new employees (ie. New customers for intranet content) add themselves more easily into groups they may be interested in.

The potential conflict I see is that by allowing people to modify the group membership means you should not be setting the group up as a security group, only a distribution group, which would limit the group's use for granting SharePoint or other system authentication.

If anyone has creative ideas or insight into this concept, let me know.

I also maintain Gov Delivery contact lists for marketing purposes/html-formatted mass emails. The caveat with these above-mentioned distribution groups is that we are not the exclusive administrator for them – they are essentially used as listservs for collaboration.

Thanks,
Meagan

Hi Meagan,

For internal groups, we built a system here at CDC that allows people to request addition, than automates the approval process and adds them to the AD group when approved. Very handy for SharePoint and access management. Also you can set up multiple managers so you don't need to be "the person" managing the group.

I can show you how it works, but we'll need to set up an electronic meeting so I can show my screen.

Also — are there any feds out there whose agency website includes, as its primary customer satisfaction measurement, a simple binary indicator like thumbs up/down icons, smiley vs. frowny face, or the like? I assume this would be augmented with fields for the two-way part of the communication, but I'm interested in seeing any ways federal agency sites are handling this outside of multi-question surveys. Hello,
The USPTO website has a "Thumbs up/ Thumbs down" option on nearly all pages. Once you pick helpful/not helpful, you also get the option to give more substantive written comments. This feedback is collected at the page level, which allows us to know how customers feel about a specific page, rather than the whole site. This gives us good granular feedback such as the ability to look across our most positive/negatively reviewed content to see if there are patterns, such as the use a particular layout template that people find confusing.

However, in addition to this we also deploy a traditional website survey run by Foresee, which is a multi-question survey about the whole website experience (site speed, content, design, task completion etc.).

Hope this additional information is helpful,

~Laura

Also — are there any feds out there whose agency website includes, as its primary customer satisfaction measurement, a simple binary indicator like thumbs up/down icons, smiley vs. frowny face, or the like? I assume this would be augmented with fields for the two-way part of the communication, but I'm interested in seeing any ways federal agency sites are handling this outside of multi-question surveys. Thanks!

Artists at State exhibition

Posting this to explore the possibility that there may be other employees at State who pursue an artistic interest (painting, photography, sculpture) either as amateurs or otherwise, and might be interested in showing their work in an exhibition here at State.

Drop a line. If there are enough of us, and some of us are willing to volunteer our time, we might be able to pull off quite an exhibition!

At USCIS we have a simple on-page feedback, Yes/No. it works really well <https://www.uscis.gov/greencard> bottom of the page. Esp. useful for our authors to see what people are saying when they are editing their pages.

Hello all,
I'm trying to identify some free image-compression software that I can have my team members use to decrease the file size of their images before uploading to the website. They are fond of using Pixlr.com for cropping/manipulating images, but the resulting file size is rather large, no matter how small the image dimensions are, and on pages with several photos, it starts to slow down performance. I use Photoshop Elements, which has a good "save for Web" feature, but they are not interested in using it. Any recommendations would be much appreciated.

Thanks,

Wendy

Hi there,

On my Mac I often use ImageOptim. Their site has a few recommendations of tools for other operating systems as well.

JPEGmini is $30 for a single license, but you can install it on at least three separate machines, I believe. It has proven to work very well at compressing files with no visible loss in quality. I run all of my JPEGs through it before uploading.

Thanks,

Hello all,
 I'm trying to identify some free image-compression software that I can have my team members use to decrease the file size of their images before uploading to the website. They are fond of using Pixlr.com for cropping/manipulating images, but the resulting file size is rather large, no matter how small the image dimensions are, and on pages with several photos, it starts to slow down performance. I use Photoshop Elements, which has a good "save for Web" feature, but they are not interested in using it. Any recommendations would be much appreciated.

Thanks,

Wendy

The following practice was how I treated my images for my personal web use, not what I have practiced "religiously" at work with content management systems, Plone or WordPress. For my personal web use, local or internet,

I may be ignorant, but I don't think "compress" is the best word for dealing with images.

I would not compress an image. I would copy the image, and downsize the copy by choice of dimension and file format.

In case of images on the web, I consider them second-generation images, as color prints are to negatives, or scans are to transparencies. Just like Photoshopping compared to film or RAW.

To decrease the file size, I would first consider how large I want it to display, and it's expected functionality. For example, 500px x 400px as full-size and/or 100px80px thumbnail, then do both, and more than likely as PNG.

I always keep "the original" offline, and upload copies or "mutants".

I have done copies in JPG, PNG, GIF, TIFF, PDF, and BMP. Depends on your purpose.

Note: One can try this practice with Windows Paint. Also, do not forget using <img> with or without width and length attributes.

My personal view is that everything uploaded to the web is a copy, and a local original at the original quality is the mother of all clones.

Happy Thursday,

Hi Wendy -

Great question. I often run sites through Google's Pagespeed Insights tool and there's so often lots of low-hanging fruit that many of us can be doing to improve site performance.

Clicking through the results leads to a number of pages of best practices, which includes some links to solutions. Here's the page for image optimization.

Thanks Gray Brooks. I'll spend some time at Google's Pagespeed Insights.

My earlier "suggestion" presumed that there may be more to response times than images. Maybe some javascripts responding to user behavior?

Long time ago, I tried manual pages with "static" images, ie. no javascript for behavior. Like three files for three image size/resolution combos. It depends.

Optimization is good, but sometimes, one can avoid the need.

Happy Friday all.
